Marius and Attilius being come to Rome, made report of their embassy within the Capitoll, in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving the KK. by means of a cessation from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For so well appointed was he and furnished with all provision for war, and they contrariwise so unprovided every way, that he might easily have possessed himself of all places of opportunity and advantage, before that their army could pass over into Greece. But now having this respite and time of the truce, as the King would come nothing better provided, so the Romans might begin the war, more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they by their coming distracted and let a jar in the general Council of the Baotians, so as by no means any more hereafter they can be rejoyned to the Macedonians by consent and accord. The greater part of the Senat approved this service of theirs

A theirs as performed with singular discretion and dexterity: But the old Senators; and those that held in remembrance the ancient manner and custome of the Romans, said plainly, "That in all the course of that embassy, they could see no Roman practice and dealing at all, Out an efforts (say they) were wont to war not by wait-laying and secret ambushes, nor by skirmishes in the night-season, nor yet by false semblant of running away and sudden turning their face again at unawares upon their unprovided enemies; neither sought they to glorifie themselves by unskill flights more than by true vertue and valour: Their use and manner was, to intimate and publish wars before they made any: yea, and to denounce and proclaim the same; or otherwise also to assign and appoint the very place where they went to strike a battell. According to this plain and faithfull dealing, they detected and disclosed unto K. Pyrrhus the Physician that would by poison have taken away his life: by the same they delivered bound unto the Faliskians the villanous traitor that would have betrayed the children of their K. These are the Romanishions (say they) not to use the cunning calls and flie shifts of the Carthaginians, nor the crafty policies of Grecians, who ever reputed it more glorious and honourable by fraud to compass, than by force to surpass the enemy. Indeed otherwhiles for the present time, more good is done and greater matters are effected by guile and policy, than by valour and vertue: but to say a truth the courage of that enemy is for ever conquered, who is forced to confess, that he was vanquished not by cunning nor by venture, but in just and lawfull war by main strength and close fight at handy grips. Thus spake the ancients, who had no great liking to the new-found devices of these politicians. Howbeit, that side of the Senat which made more reckoning of profit than of honesty carried it away and imported so much, that not only the first embassy of Marius was approved, as well performed, but also himself was sent back again with certain Quinquereemes, with a mandate also & commission to deal in the rest according as he should think to stand with the good of the Common-weal. They dispatched likewise Aul. Attilius to seize Larissa in Thessaly for fear lest in the term of truce were expired, Perseus should send a garrison thither and hold in his hand the capitall City of Thessaly. The said Attilius had a warrant to receive 2000 footmen of Ca. Scivinius for to effectuate that enterprise. Also P. Lentulus lately returned out of Achaia was allowed the conduct of 300 soldiery of the Italian nation, to the end that at T. Ardes he should endeavour to bring all Baotia under the obedience of the Romans. When all things were set in this forwardness, albeit they were at a point and fully resolved to make war, yet thought good it was to give audience unto the embassadors of Perseus in the Senat; who rehearsed and related in manner the same reasons which were delivered by the King in the late conference and parley. Much also they made and laboured hard, to acquit the King of the imputation laid to his charge for seeking the death of Eumenes: but with small probability or none at all: for the thing was too too apparent. In the end they fell to prayer and intreaty: howbeit, no ear was given unto them, with any such mind and heart, as could be either instructed or inclined. Instead thereof, warned straightly they were to depart immediately forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirty daies out of Italy. After this, P. Licinius the Col, who was charged with the Province of Spain, had commandment given him to assign unto the army the soonest day that he could, for to meet in one certain place, C. Lucretius the Prator who had the conduct of the fleet, took his leave of the City with forty Quinquereemes: for advised it was, that the rest of the ships which had been repaired, should be staid at home for to be employed otherwise about the City. And the Prator sent his brother Lucretius before with one Galeace or Quinquereeme & commission to receive of the allies that shipping which by covenant they were to find; and with them near the Island Cephallenia, to joyn with the rest of the armada to wit, from the Rhogens one trireme; a ly from the Locrians twain, from the Urtis 4. With which he coasted along Italy, and having doubled the utmost point of Calabria within the Ionian sea, he arrived at Dyrbachium. There he found 19 gallies or barks of the Dyrbachians, 2 of the Issians, and 54 belonging to K. Genius: which he took all with him along, making semblance that he supposed they were provided of purpose for the service of the Romans: with this fleet by the third day he fell with the Isle Corfu: and so forward he made sail, and arrived at Cephallenia. C. Lucretius the Prator, having looked to sea from Neples, crossed the Straights of Sicily, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewise to Cephallenia. Then the fleet took anchor, expecting as well the arrivall of the land-forces, as also that the hulks and vessels of carriage which were scattered upon the seas from the rest of their company, might overtake them. It hapned about this time, that Pub. Licinius the Col, having conceived and solemnly made his vows within the Capitoll, departed in his coat of arms from the City. A solemnity at all times very this is, done with much dignity and majesty: but especially with exceeding great pleasure and contentment of the beholders; when the Col, is accompanied with a stately train at his first setting forth, to encounter some great and famous enemy, renowned as well for vertue as quality and fortune: for at such a time men assemble and gather together, not only in regard of duty to acquit themselves of their devoir, but also upon a desire they have of the very view and sight presented unto their eyes; namely, to see their captain to whose conduct and counsell they have committed the managing and defence of the Common-weal. Moreover, they took occasion thereby to think of the hazard of war, how adventurous is the event, and how doubtful the issue of battell in the field. They call to mind the alternative course of good fortune and bad; and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadvised rashness of leaders, many foills and overthrowes have hapned; and contrariwise by polittick wisdom and hardy courage, great matters have been effected, and happy victories achieved. And what mortal man is he that knoweth, of what mind and carriage he good or bad, how fortunate or unlucky the Col. is, whom they send forth to war: whether he be like soon to be seen again, in triumphant wife with his victorious army mounting up the Capitoll unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave: or shall give occasion to the enemies in the same manner to rejoice? As for Perseus the K. (against whom this expedition and journey is taken) a Prince he is, highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (so famous for fears of arms,) and also by his father Philip (who among other fortunate achievements of his, was ennobled by his war against the Romans. Moreover, the very name of Perseus himself (since time that first the diadem was set upon his head) was in every mans mouth, and no talk continually but of him and the expectation of this war. With these and such like cogitations (I say) a mighty number of men of all sorts and degrees attended and accompanied the Col. at his departure. With him I were sent two Colonels or knight-masters above the rest, who had been Col. namely, C. Claudius and Q. Muring: also three brave and lusty young gallants, to wit, P. Lentulus and the two Manlius, both surnamed Acidini, the one son to M. Manlius, and the other to L. Manlius. The Col. thus accompanied, first went to Brundisium to the army, and from thence passed the seas to Nymphæum and so encamped in the territory of Apollonia.

*This M. Manlius seemeth to be plebeian gentile: for that there passed an act long before, That no Manlius Patrius might be named Acidinus: and that there were Manlius surnamed gentile, Fulvius Priscus that learned Antiquary hath well collected out of Cicero in L. Philip.

Perseus some few daies before, upon the return of his ambassadors from Rome, who had clean put him out of all hope of peace, held a council: wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great variety of sundry opinions. Some were of mind, that in case the Romans enjoyed them either to yield a tribute, or to forgo some of their lands: yea, if they imposed upon them some fine by way of amends and satisfaction: in brief, whatsoever else they set down and it ordained, to do and suffer all for to redeem their peace, and not to refuse any condition were it never so hard but to take heed and provide in any wise, that Perseus put not himself nor the realm upon the dangerous hazard of so great a jeopardy. For if he held still the main point and continued in quiet possession of his kingdom, in time and space much good might happen: by means whereof he should be able not only to lick himself whole and recover his losses, but also become hereafter dread and terrible even unto those of whom now he standeth in fear. But the far greater part carried with them a more courageous spirit and gave advice accordingly. For they affirmed, That if Perseus parted with ought and yielded never so little, he must make account withall to quit the free-hold of his whole kingdom soon after. For it is neither money nor land (say they) that the Romans want: but this they would full well, That as all things else in the world, so especially great monarchies and empires are subject to many accidents and casualties: right well they know also, how they have quelled and bruised the puissance of the Carthaginians, and for to yoke their necks and hold them down, have set up a mighty King to be their neighbour and to command them: yea, and that Antiochus and all his race is removed and chased beyond the mountain Taurus. There remaineth only now the realm of Macedony, which is both feared in a near region and also (if the fortune of the people of Rome should hap to fail) seemeth able to give heart and courage to her Kings at this day, answerable to that of their noble progenitors in former times. And therefore while the State standeth entire and unfeigned, Perseus ought not to resolve, whether he had rather by forgoing one thing after another, strip himself in the end of all his goods and lands, & so turned clean out of his kingdom, be driven to request at the Romans M hand either Samothracia or some other such petty Isle, where, in quality of a private person he may survive his royall estate, and live to old age in base contempt and needy poverty: or else, to take arms in the defence and maintenance of his royall place and dignity, like a Prince of valour and courage; and either abide all hazards whatsoever the fortune of the field shall plunge him into: or after victory achieved deliver the whole world from the dominion and imperious signory of the Romans. And no greater wonder and miracle is it to hunt the Romans out of Greece, than it was to chase Annibal out of Italy: neither see we in good faith (if they) how by any reason it can well stand, that he who resisted with all his might and main his own brothers, that he would have made himself K. against all right and law, should now to strangers and aliens render the possession thereof, which he came so well and truly by, and wherein he is so right fully invested? Finally, in war and peace howsoever men make questions, disputing and arguing to and fro, yet this conclusion they all grant and agree upon, That as there is nothing more shamefull and dishonest, than to abandon and lose a kingdom without battell, so there is nothing more glorious and honourable than for the maintenance of Princely dignity and regal majesty to hazard all fortune whatsoever. This Council was holden at Pella, the ancient Palace wherein the Macedonian K. kept their royall court. Whereupon he sent his letters in are of that mind and resolution, let us take arms & to the field: whereupon he sent his letters in to all parts to his gallants and captains, and assembled & drew all his forces to Citium, a town of Macedony. Himself in person after he had performed a magnificent sacrifice (like a K. for 100 head of beasts to the honour of Minerva, surnamed Alcida, he departed accompanied with a number of his courtiers, pensioners, and yeomen of the guard to Citium. To which place were gathered already all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliary strangers. He pitched his camp before the town and embattled all his armed men in the plain. He was in all forty thousand strong: whereof of one half well-near consisted of those whom they call Phalangites, and those were commanded by one Hippias of Berthea. Besides, there were two choice companies (for the power of age and strength of body) selected out of the whole number of targettiers, called Cerrari. This regiment

A themselves called by the name of The legion: and the same was under the conduct of Leontaris and Thraupis both Euboeians. The rest of the targettiers to the number of three thousand or very near, were led by Antiphilus of Edessa. The Pæonians, those also of Pasoria and P. Armonia (places subject to the Thracians) and the Agrians, together with some inhabitants of Thracia intermingled among them, amounted also to the number of three thousand. Didas of Pæonia had levied and armed them, even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were besides two thousand Frenchmen in arms under the leading of captain Alepidorus, from Heraclea likewise out of the Sinitian country, there were three thousand Thracians, free-men born, under a leader of their own. The like number well-near of Cretensians followed their Commanders, Sofus of Phalaris, and Syllus of Gnosus: also Leontides the Lacedæmonian, had the charge of five hundred out of Greece, but a mixt company they were of divers nations. This Leontides was said to have been of the blood royall, a banished person, condemned in a frequent assembly and Council of the Achæans, for certain letters which he sent to Perseus, and were intercepted. The Ætolians and Boeotians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lycon an Achæan. These auxiliaries or aid-fouldiers of so many states and nations mixt and blended together, grew tall upon the number of 12000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedony 3000 horie or thereabout. Corys King of the Odryians, the son of Senther, was thither come with 1000 chosen men of arms, and almost as many footmen. In sum, the whole army arose to the number of 30000 foot, and 4000 horie men. And this was held for certain, that the like army was never raised by any King of Macedony, unless it were that again, with which Alexander the Great C passed over into Asia. I twenty years now and fix were come and gone, since time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own suit and request: during which space between, Macedony being in rest and quietness, had brought forth a goodly fry of fresh youth: a great part whereof was of sufficient age to bear arms: and by the continual skirmishes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakened, and more enured than wearied; and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martiall feats: whereby it came to pass, that all things were prest and in readines for the war, which Philip first, and Perseus afterwards projected to wage against the Romans.

This army stirred and advanced a little, not in manner of a full march as to a present battell; but only for this that they would not be seen to have stood still in their arms: and thus armed as the fouldiers were, Perseus called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunal, he stood there with his two sons about him, one of either hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he was his brother; but the younger (whom they called Alexander) was his own naturall son. Then and there he exhorted his fouldiers to fight manfully, and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and also to himself. As for my father (quod he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into arms and begin war again; but in the very preparation thereof, he was suddenly surprisid and stricken with death. To my self at one time were ambassadors from them sent to treat of peace, and armed fouldiers also for to seize upon the Cities of Greece. Afterwards by a deceitful shew of a parley under colour of reconciliation and peace making, we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter, to the end that they might gain time to prepare for war. And now is the Col. coming with two Roman legions, having either of them some 3000 horie besides, and with a proportionable number (and that is the most) of allies as well foot as horie. And say that the K. both Enmenes & Malanissus joyn with their aid-forces, yet can they not amount above the number of 7000. Now that ye have heard what the strength is of the enemies, regard and compare your own army, namely, how far both in number as also in goodness and quality of fouldiers, you surpass them: being your selves from your childhood and infancy warriors trained in practice of arms and warfare, wrought, framed, and hardened in so many battels: where as they be new & raw fouldiers taken up in haste, and enrolled now the first time against this present service. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, F what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to set against them, have to aid us Thracians and Gauls the most courageous nations under heaven. For harness and weapons, they have no other than such as every poor fouldier is able to provide for himself: but the Macedonians are furnished out of the Kings royall armory and arsenal with such armors of proof, as my father in many years could be made with great care, & to his no small expence. The Romans be far from their provisions, and the same exposed to all the casualties of the sea: but we besides the revenues and issues out of the mines of metal, have laid by both coin and corn sufficient to serve for ten years. The Macedonians have store and plenty in great abundance of all things necessary, & be provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the careful diligence of a K. It remaineth now that ye carry that mind and courage with you, which your noble progenitors bare before you, those I say, who after they had conquered & subdued all Europ, passed into Asia, and by force of arms made way & discovered that part of the world that was never heard of before, and gave not over to win ground fill and make more conquests, untill they were barred by the red sea, & could find no more land to conquer. But now beleave me, fortune hath denounc'd a trial by war, not for the purchase of the utmost bounds & marches of India, but for out-ree hold and possession for our inheritance even of Macedony. These Romans, when they waited against my father, pretended a goodly title & made a glorious shew to the world, as though they

"hand assail their camp, which we might have forced and won this day, but that they took them H
 "to their heels and fled. But if they will come to a field and try the quarrel by the sword's point,
 "look ye for no other issue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with "horsemen. These words, both the horsemen (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of "their enemies lying slain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleasure and content"ment, as measuring the hope of the future speed by the fortune passed: and also the footmen en-
 "flamed now with the glory of others (and namely those that were of the Macedonian Phalans)
 "withed with all their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not "only show their valiant service before the K, but also win semblable glory of their enemies. Thus "only these valiant service before the K, but also win semblable glory of their enemies. Thus
 "the assembly was dissolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon
 "as K, Perseus during these daies, (at in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct
 "of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not so lusty for his late victory, some of "his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and "compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft, and "engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, out of which he should not be "able to recover and retire into safety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not "over-confidently to truit upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (say they) of a wise man in"deed and truly happy. And therefore the best course is, to send certain men of purpose unto the K
 "Cof, for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accep"ted peace heretofore of T. Quintus the conqueror. For neither (say they) can the war be taken "up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battle: nor ever will there be "presented more firm and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion,
 "which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and assent to "any accord, considering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But in case the "Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engrafted pertinacity of theirs, should not hear reason
 "but refuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witnesses, as well of the moderation
 "of Perseus, as of their pride & insolent forwardness. The K, was willing enough to give ear to this,
 "and indeed never misliked such discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the assent I
 "of the most part: whereupon ambassadors were sent to the Cof, & in a frequent Council assem"bled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded and promised that Perseus should pay unto
 "the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for: and likewise quit the same Cities,
 "coasts, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrendered. To this effect spake the embas-
 "sadors: who being retired aside, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end, Roman constan"tly imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and use was, in time of ad"versity to hear all out and set a good countenance, but in prosperity to hold an even hand and to "use governance. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might be granted with this "condition. That K, Perseus should permit full and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose "both of his person and the kingdom of Macedony at their good pleasure. When the Embas-
 "sadors had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistence of the Romans made "them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of "them forbore to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romans would be glad short"ly to seek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when "it was offered. But Perseus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the "confidence they had in their own forces: inasmuch as he gave not over so, but assailed to tempt
 "the Cof, if haply by augmenting the sum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning "whatsoever. But seeing him nothing to come down nor to alter one jot from the first answer; in "despair now of all peace, he returned to Sycium from whence he came, putting off once again to "try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was flown over all Greece, N
 "and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Ma-
 "cedonians rejoiced to hear this news, but also very many of them who were obliged and be"holden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and some likewise who "had tasted of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all,
 "but only upon a foolish and perverse affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordi"narily is carried away in the beholding of disports and triall of malletries, even to favour ever"more the weaker and him that taketh the foil.

At the same time Lucretius the Pretor had with most forcible means assaulted the City of Ha- livius in Baotia: and albeit the besieged defendants within were relieved by no forraign aid, but only the youth of the Coronians (who at the beginning of the siege entred the City) nor hoped O for any to come: yet they stood out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with strength of hand: for they lasted forth many times, and killed upon the fabricks and engines of the enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall thereupon a mighty weight and counterpoise of lead and so depressed and drave it down to the ground. And it haply the enemies who ran with the ram against the wall, avoided the device of theirs laid battery, and shook it in some other place: the townsmen within, raised presently with great speed another more, piling

A piling up hastily the stones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruins of the breaches. The Consul seeing this manner of service by way of ordinance and battery, to become flow and tedious, commanded to divide ladders amongst every company, and purposed to invest the City round about with the Eicadalo: supposing that the number which he had would be sufficient to exploit this enterprise, because on that side whereas the Town is enclosed with a marsh, it was bootless (or rather unpensible) to assault it. Himself in person presented 2000 elect footsoldiers before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrown to the end that in the very instant, whilst he assailed to enter at the breach, the town-men should run all thither to repulse him, and in the mean while the walls void of defendants might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within belittled themselves easily to B give him the repulse. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of faggots made of dric vine cuttings and such small brush, they stood ready with flaming firebrands and burning links threatening ever and anon to kindle the lame and ter all on fire, to the end that being defended from the enemy by the means of fire between they might have time to oppose an inner countermure against them. But by mistake this device and enterprise of theirs was un-peached. For there poured down on a sudden such a mighty shower of rain that the eyes would not easily take fire, and look what was set for a burning, it soon was quenched again by which means not only the passage was made open between the smoking faggots drawn apart one from another here and there, but whilst they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many andundry parts thereof. In the first heat
 C upon the winning of the City, old and young such as chanced to come in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword, the armed footmen fled into the Castle, and the next day being past hope to make good the place, they yielded and were all sold under the gulf and in portulac, to them that would bid most, to the number of 2500 men or very near. The ornaments and beauties of the City as statues, images painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found in the pillage to bear a better price, was carried to shipboard, and the Town itself raised from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Th.ber:
 which being won without any resistance he put into the hands of the bailed persons and those that took part and sided with the Romans: but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he sold by whole families in open market to the best chapmen, having D performed these exploits in Baotia, he retired himself to the Sea side to his ships.

Whiles these affairs passed thus in Baotia, Perseus lodged for certain daies in a camp at Sycium, Where being advertised, that the Romans made great haste to him the certain news repeated down, and to carry it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguers, and that every town before his tent cut and fired off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thrash and drive out the cleaver corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw through all parts of the campe, he supposed it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavilions on fire. Whereupon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow bedewed with pitch and tar: thus provided and furnished he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being deflected before. But all came to nothing, for the for-E most corps de guard although they were surprised with this sudden coming, by their trouble and affright awakened and raised all the rest, and immediately the alarm was given: so as at one instant the soldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and prest for to defend the camp. Perseus likewise incontinently turned about with his engines, putting his tar-cage and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after: himself with the cavalry and light-armors staid behind to fortify and guard the rearward, supposing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the main bar. His light armed soldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorne hope and loose advance couriers, but the horse and footmen both retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the ter-F ritory of Crannon, which as yet was not undamaged. Whiles they lay encamped in safety and mitrilling nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the war between Sy- crannon and Crannon was so difficult for want of water;) behold all on a sudden early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed footmen shewed themselves upon the hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Sycium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind, about the break of day upon the plain next thereto. For a while he stood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans might be trained forth to an horse-fight. But perceiving them not to stir at all, he sent one on horseback to command the footmen to retire again to Sycium, and himself in person followed freight after. The Roman horsemen made after a pretty distance off. If haply they could spie any G vantage in one place or other to charge upon them, disband and straggle amider. But when they saw that in their dismarch they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their ranks, they also returned into the camp. After this the King weary of making so long journeys dislodged and removed to Alopium. The Romans for their part likewise having moved down all the corn of Crannon passed into the territory of Phalaenum. The King having intelligence by a renegade revolt that the Romans were scattered all over the fields and reaping the standing corn without any guard of armed men, made a rode with 1000 horse & 2000 Candiors & Thracians who marching with as great hast as possibly they could, set upon the Romans at unawares all unprovided; where he took a thousand carts or thereabouts, together with their teams, most of them laden, and upon 600 men besides. The guard and convoy of this booty into the campe he committed to the charge of 300 Cretensians. Himself having rallied his cavalry dispersed here and there busy in execution, and reunited withal the rest of the footmen led them to the next corps de guard or garrison of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might be surpris'd and vanquish'd. L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who seeing his souldiers affrighted with this suddain coming of the enemies, retired with them to an hill neer at hand, for to defend himself by the vantage and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and forces he was too weak. Where after he had call his men into a ring, for to ward against the shot of arrows and darts by a roof and fence of targets couched close together over their heads: Perseus having environed the hill round about with armed men, commanded some to mount up and assaye to win the place on all parts, if possibly they could; and then to fight close hand to hand: others he charged to lance their darts and shoot their shafts thick at them a for off. The Romans were beset with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmish and fight close together because of those who laboured to climb the hill: and say they had broke any ranks with excursions and outrodes upon them, yet were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Most hurt they had by certain weapons called Cestrophendones (sliding darts.) A new kind of dart this was and lately devised in the time of this very war. It had a sharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the same fast in a steel which was half a cubit long, and about the thickness of a mans finger: for to flie direct and straight, three leathers it had about it in man of a shaft: the sling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal size: now when as the sling swung it about, as it lay even poised in the greater capacity of the leather thong, out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the souldiers being very sore wounded as well with this weapon as all other sorts of shot, so as now for weariness they were scarce able to bear their own armour: the King was earnestly in hand with them to yeeld and submit, assuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea and otherwhiles promised them rewards and recompences. But there was not a man whose heart enclined once thereto. Now as they stood thus stiff and resolute to die there shone upon them a little comfort and some hope of evasion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the foragers and corn purveyors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp brought word unto the Consul, that the corps de guard aforesaid was besieged round: whereupon being moved with the jeopardy wherein so many citizens stood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed souldiers, and unto them joyned certain new succours of the Numidians as well horse as foot, together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the ensignes of the legions should follow after. Himself in person marched before toward the hill aforesaid, taking with him a certain number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes, Attalus, and Magesene also the King of the Numidians, flanked the Col, on either side. When as the besieged Romans had a sight once of the foremost ensignes of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former extrem despair. Perseus, who had purposed in the first place not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard but to content himself with the fortunate success which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and slain some of the foragers: secondly (when he was in some sort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of, about him: yet puffed up and carried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both staid in person to attend the enemies coming, and also sent out in all hast, for the Macedonian Phalanx. Which coming later than the present necessity required (albeit in great hast they hurried) it fell out so, that they were to encounter (troubled and disordered as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Col, who had prevented them presently welcomed them with battail. At the first, the Macedonians made resistance: but afterwards being in no respect equal unto the enemies, after they had lost three hundred footmen with four and twenty of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that cornet which they call Sacra (amongst whom Antimachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to pass, was more troublesome to speak of, than the skirmish and battail it self. The Phalanx being sent unto by a messenger in hast, and conducted as hastily, encountered first in a certain freight a troop of prisoners, and likewise the waggons charged with corn. Who being led at to give way, thereupon arose a great trouble as well of the one part as the other: whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed souldiers cast down and overthrow the heaps of lardage and baggage, for otherwise there could no way be made: and the draught-beasts being pricked and provoked forward, raged and made some work in the press and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they disengaged and rid of this confused and disordered company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horsemen discomfited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalanx. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads: in such sort as if their enemies durst have entred into the freight and pursued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Consul contenting himself with a mean good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard from off

A the hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Some write that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 8000 enemies were slain, and among them Sopater and Antipater two of the Kings Captains. Also that there were taken prisoners about 2400: and military ensignes 27 carried away. Neither was the victory easily gotten but cost blood, for not so few as 4500 were slain of the Consul his army, and five guidons of the left wing lost. This journey recomfited the Romans, but danted and quailed Perseus in such sort, as after he had staid a few daies at Mopsilum, especially about entering the bodies of his dead souldiers, and left a sufficient garrison at Gonos, he retired his army into Macedony, leaving also at Phbia one of his own Captains named Timotheus, with some small forces, whom he commanded to assaye the Magnesians and the borderers adjoining. When he was come to Pella, he dismissed his army out of the field, and sent them to their

B winning harbors, but himself together with King Corys went to Theffalonia. Thither news came, that Atlebius a petty King of the Thracians, and Corynus a Captain under King Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Corys, and were masters of the country which they call Marene. And therefore supposing that he must needs discharge Corys to look to the defence of his own realm, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for six months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Consul after he heard that Perseus was gone, approached with his army neer to Gonos, and there lodged: if haply he might force and gain that also. Situat it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and gullet of the heights, and is the very frontier Town, yeelding both a most assured C defence and strength to all Macedony, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Theffaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the natural site thereof, as the strong garrison therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perthabia, after he had forced Mallas at the first assault and put it to the rantaek: and received Triphile with the rest of Perthabia, yeelded by composition, he returned to Larissa. And then having sent Eumenes and Attalus home into their own country, and bestowed Magesene and the Numidians in divers Cities of Theffaly neer at hand to remain there for the winter time, and distributed part of his forces throughout all Theffaly, in such sort, that not only they had all commodious wintering, but also served in stead of garrisons to the Cities. Q. Mutius his Lieutenant he sent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the considerers of the D Greek Cities, save only the Achaeans he licensed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Theffaly in Phbia, where he raled down to the ground Pittema abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antrona he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached before Larissa with his forces. The City was left desolate, for all the people were retired into the fortrels, the which he began to assault: and first the Kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place: of whom the Townsmen being forsaken and left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he stood in doubt whether he should assail Demetrias first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and state of Boeotia. For the men of Thebes being grievously molested and annoyed by thole of Coronae, had sent for him into Boeotia: at whose prayers, thither he conducted his army; and besides, Boeotia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

The three and fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and fortieth Book.

F Divers Pretors were judicially condemned, for demeaning themselves with cruelty and avarice: in the administration of their Provinces. P. Licinius Crassus the Pro-consul was by force many Cities in Greece, and cruelly rifled them. For which rigour of his, the captives whom he had sold under the garland in open market, were by an order directed out of the Senat, restored forward to their former estate. The Admirals of the Roman fleets committed many outrages and enormities against their allies. Besides, there are comprised in this book, the prosperous affairs of King Perseus in Thracia, after he had vanquished the Dardanians and subdued Illyricum, whereof Centius was King. The trouble which began in Spain by means of Olonicus, were appeased by his death. M. Aemilius Lepidus, was by the Consors created president of the Senat.

The three and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

T He same summer, wherein the Romans won the victory with horse-fight in Theffaly, the Lieutenant being sent into Illyricum from the Consul, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yeeld: unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of this answer. That as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved, the Senat neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the same, since they were committed. But against all right and equity it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, and absent, such a personage as he is, namely, a man who had been Consul; considering also that his employment about the C.W. is the occasion of his absence. When C. Celsus is once returned out of Macedony, then if they would shew themselves and accuse him face to face, the Senat would hear the cause and take knowledge accordingly, yea, and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was, that these nations should not be dispatched only with this bare answer, but that Embassadors also should be sent: two unto the foresaid King beyond the Alps; and other three to the people above named, for to acquaint them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senat. And they gave order besides to send presents to each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Asles over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren: these gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five peeces of plate in silver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound: two hard hories with their riders and lackies: likewise horsemens armour and their cassocks: and liveries likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their money buy each of them ten hories, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassadors lent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Lelius and M. Emilius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sticinius, P. Cornelius Blasio, and T. Memmius.

Moreover, these met together in Rome at once, the Embassadors of many States both of Greece and Asia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senat, who related, That they had sent unto the Consul P. Licinius and the Pretor C. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make: but seeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Modii of corn. Which, albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forraim corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to be wanting in any dutiful service: and willing they were yet, and prest to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milesians for their part said, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offered themselves to be ready to accomplish all that the Senat should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, That they had built a * Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained besides, that in the honour of that goddess there should be a solemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capitol as a gift and offering to Jup. Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horsemens shields, which they were minded to bestow upon those, unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampiscus came with a golden crown weighing four score pound, protesting, That they had quit and abandoned Perseus, so soon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedony, notwithstanding they owed allegiance unto Perseus and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which consideration as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour to be gratified withal, but to be received into the amity of the people of Rome: and in case there should be peace concluded with Perseus, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampiscans, order was given to Q. Manius the Pretor, to enter and enrol them in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Asles. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Consul. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embassadors out of Africa, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had on shipboard at the sea-side ready to carry the same wherefoever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs they accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that this gift and recognizance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and truly allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both States. In like sort the Embassadors of Malassia promised the same proportion of corn, with 1200 hories and twelve Elephants, assuring them in his name, to do whatsoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful, and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedony to the Consul A. Hostilius, those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Asles apiece. The Cretensian Embassadors, related how they had sent into Macedony such a number of Archers, as the Consul P. Licinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there served more Archers of theirs under Perseus than with the Romans, this answer was made unto them, That if the Cretensians would well and truly and in good earnest transfer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Perseus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them answer as certain and assured allies: in the mean while; they should stand,

A stand, that it was the will and pleasure of the Senat, that the Cretensians should with all speed possible call home all those souldiers whom they had in any garrison of King Perseus. The Candians being dismissed with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in: and at the very first sight of them, it soon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to lend an embassage: when Alcicion the chief man among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his leet, was brought into the Senat in a litter, in which extremity diseased as he was there was no pleading of any excuse by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, since he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preface and preamble, saying, "He had nothing left alive but his tongue, for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, and shewed what contumelies and good turns the State wherein he lived had performed to the Captains B General and armies of the Romans, both of old and also of late in the war against Perseus. After this, he declared what parts of pride, covetousness and cruelty, firstly, Lucretius a Roman Pretor had exercised upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortensius practised, at that time above all others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they more grievous than those which they presently suffered rather than they would yield to Perseus. And as for Lucretius and Hortensius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for their safety to have shut their gates against them than to receive them into their City. For such as had excluded them forth, as namely they of Enabasis, Amphipolis, Laracea and Eum, remain still entire and in good estate: but with us (ay they) the Temples have been robbed of all their beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoiled by these sacrilegious, C. Lucretius hath carried all away by water over to Antium, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the persons here born, so as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have been and daily are pillaged & rifled. For according to the use & fashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise houleth his mariners as well in summer as winter, and our houses are full of a rabble of these sailors and sea-men, in such sort as our wives and children be forced to converse among such grooms as make no account at all what either they say or do. Heretofore thought good it was, to send for Lucretius into the Senat, that he might see his accuser, answer face to face, and purge himself of these challenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence than had been spoken against him in his absence. Over and besides, these shewed themselves and joined together against him, two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit, M. Lucretius Tullus and D. Cn. Aspidius. And these two not only coured him before the Senat, but also having drawn him perforce into the general assembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took our process also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Manius the Pretor, by order from the Senat, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Whereas ye allege and say, That ye have well delivered of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortensius still practiseth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge so of it, that knoweth how E they leveyed war upon King Perseus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and set it at liberty: and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their Magistrats and Governors sent from hence? Write therefore they would unto L. Hortensius the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free-born persons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all, that they deemed it meet and reason, that no sailor or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and entertained in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortensius, by commandment from the Senat. Unto the Embassadors were gifts sent, to every one as much as came to 2000 Asles. As for Alcicion, he was allowed his F carriage in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundisium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commended an action against him before the people, to be a fined at a million of Asles. And in a general assembly and Session holden for this purpose, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, even thirty five and no fewer.

In Liguria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entered into arms, nor the Consul led his legions into their country: and when he was assured of peace for that year, he discharged the souldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 days after his first coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latine allies he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Pisa there to winter: and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gaul.

In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in suspicion Gentius and the King of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senat ordained to send from Brundisium eight ships ready rigged and fully furnished, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at * Issa, who was Governor of the Iland with the guard and strength of two Iffean Vessels: in which were put aboard and shipped 2000 souldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senat, enrolled in that quarter of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyrienn. In like manner the Consul Hostilius sent Appius Claudius into Ithyrium with four thousand footmen, for to defend the people in those parts: who not content with those forces of his own which he had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and succours of the allies, until he had put in arms eight thousand men of diverse and sundry nations. And after he had made his progress through all that region, he set him down and rested at Lichnidum a City of the Dissartians. Not far from thence there stood a frontier Town called Ulcana, and for the most part ranged under the obedience of Perseus. There were within it one thousand citizens, and a small garrison of Cretanians for their better safeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius secret courriers, advertising him, that if he would approach nearer with his army, there would be some ready at hand to betray the Town into his hands: and worth the adventure it was (say they) and would quit for all the pains: for able it was with pillage to enrich not himself and his friends only, but also all his soldiers. The I hope of this cheat, fitting so well his covetous humour, so blinded his spirit and understanding, that he had not the sense to keep with him any one of those courriers that came unto him, nor the wisdom to demand hostages for assurance of his enterprise which was to be accomplished by stealth and fraud, nor yet the foresight to send out scouts and spies, or so much reason and mother-wit as to require their oath and bond of faithful promise. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lichnidum, and within twelve miles of that City toward which he went, he encountered. Then by night at the relief of the fourth watch, he removed and set forward, leaving behind him a regiment of a thousand, for the guard of the camp. At length to the City they came, disordered in a long train, marching nothing close, but far alunder tooley one from another and scattered, by reason that in the night season they went many of them out of the way. This negligence of theirs was the more, when they saw no man appearing upon the walls: but so soon as they were approached within a darts cast, the inhabitants issued forth at once out of 2 gates and together with the shout of them that sallied forth, a mighty noise and outcry besides arose from the walls, of women howling, yelling, and ringing brazen basons and bells on every hand: besides, the confused multitude of the base people and bond-slaves together, set up most hideous and dissonant cries. These manifold terrors presented from all parts, were the cause that the Romans could not abide and stand out the first tempest and violent storm, as it were, of their fury and charge. Down they went therefore and were slain more in flight than fight; and scarce 2000 men with the Lieutenant himself, escaped and recovered the camp: for the longer way they had thither, the more means and opportunity had the enemies, to chase and overtake a great number of them, wearied upon the way. Appius stayed not so long in the camp, until he had rallied those that were dispersed in the rout, (which had been the only way to have saved those that were straggled in the fields) but immediately retired with the broken reliques of his army after this overthrow, to Lichnidum. This infelicity and such other like misfortunes happening in Macedony, were made known at Rome, by occasion of Sen. Dignus a Colonel, who was returned home for to celebrate a solemn sacrifice. In regard whereof, the LL. of the Senat fearing to receive some greater ignominy and dishonour, addressed Embassadors into Macedony. At Fulvius Flaccus and M. Caelius Rufus, to make a true report upon their knowledge how the world went there. Also that A. Hostilius the Consul should publish the assembly general for the election of Consuls, so as it might be holden in the month of January and then repair himself with all convenient speed to the City. In the mean time, M. Rutilius the Pretor had in charge, by virtue of an edict, to call home into the City all Senators from every quarter of Italy, unless such as were absent about the affairs of the state: also to give straight warning to them who now were at Rome, not to absent themselves farther than a mile from the City. These things were done according to the advice of the Senat. So the grand assembly for the election of the Consuls, was holden the 28 day of August: wherein there were created Consuls, Q. Martius Philippus the second time, and Q. Servilius Cyprius. Three days after, the Pretors also were chosen, namely, Caius Decimus, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Sulpicius Gallus, C. Marius Figulus, Sex. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Pomponius Cyprius. Unto these Pretors elect, besides the two charges within the City of civil jurisdiction, these four provinces and governments were assigned, to wit, Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and the admiralty of the navy.

Appius

At the very end of February, the Embassadors aforesaid returned out of Macedony: who recounted the ads atchieved fortunately by Perseus the summer past, and in how great fear the allies of the people of Rome stood, after so many Cities reduced under the obedience of the King. Moreover, that the Consul his army was diminished of men, by reason that so many of them made friends to be discharged, and so for favour had their passage: and they were dismissed: the fault here in, the Consul laid upon the military Tribuns or Colonels: and they again upon him. The LL. of the Senat perceived well that they made but light of the shameful foil received by the inconsiderate rashness of Claudius, in saying, That there were but very few soldiers lost of the Italian nation, and those for the most part taken up in haist and enrolled on a sudden. The Consuls elect so soon as they entered into their magistracy, were commanded to propound unto the Senat concerning the Province of Macedony, and to them were assigned the governments of Italy and Macedony. This year was leap-year, and the third day after the least Terminatus, was the day inferred between, which happened upon the calends [of March]. Within the compass of that year certain Priests, to wit, L. Flaminius, and two Pontiffs or Bishops, L. Furius Philus, and C. Livius Salinator, departed this life. The college of these Pontiffs, elected T. Manlius Torquatus in stead of Furius, and Marcus Servilius in the room of Livius.

* Ad quintum calendis Septembris. I doubt, that for (Septembris) it should be Februarius. And then is it the 28 of January: which considering the precedent mistake and the following circumstances, suiteth better to the story.

* To the God of bounds, Terminus. Solemnized it was toward the end of February the last month of the year, as appeareth by Ovid. Fasti. Quisquis annis veteris fuit istius anni: tunc quoque Terminus, Terminis habet eam.

A In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Cons. Q. Martius and Q. Servilius had moved in the Senat as touching their provinces, advised it was, That with all speed possible they should either agree between themselves, or else call lots for the governments in Italy and Macedony. And before that the lots determined this matter (so doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and sufficient number of soldiers for the supplement of the armies in both Provinces: namely, for Macedony 6000 footmen of the supplement of the armies in both Provinces: namely, for Macedony 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies: 250 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to call the old soldiers, so as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 foot and 300 horse. As for the other Consul, he was not gaged with any certain limit of Roman citizens, to be levied for the full accomplishment of his legions.

B Only this was determinately set down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 5200 foot and 200 horse: but for footmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague; namely, 10000 foot and 600 horse. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasionsoever should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Consuls might not be permitted to elect, but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to let out sixteen thousand foot and a thousand horse. And this power was only to be in acreadiness at an hours warning, for to be led forth as occasion should be offered. Their principal care was about Macedony. Ordained also it was, That for the service at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (such as were libertines and newly enfranchised) out of all parts of Macedony ten thousand, and as many out of Sicily. And unto whether of the Consuls the Province of Italy fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armada wherefore appointed to make up the decayed bands. There also, a certain number was set down, for every legion, was to govern in Spain, had commision to levy of the allies four thousand footmen, and three hundred horse.

I am not ignorant, that from the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly men now adies are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-signify nothing to come by signs and tokens: it proceedeth also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more either be published and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but me thinks I carry a mind, that is become (as it were) antique also; yea, and some scrupulous devotion ariseth in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories, which those sage fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered of by the State, yea, and to require publick expiation. Well to proceed, from August were two fearful sights reported that year, namely, That aburning and blazing flame was seen in the sky and a cow known to speak, kept and nourished at the publick charges. At Monte also much about those daies, the welkin seemed to be on a light fire. At Rome there fell a shower that rained flowers. In the fortels at Comes the image of Apollo wept three daies and three nights continuantly. In the City of Rome, two sextons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of chappel of Fortuna Primigenia, which standeth upon the Capitol hill, there happened two divers and different prodigious signs, namely, That in the Chappel-yard there sprung up a palm-tree: and all one day it rained blood. Two other strange things there were, whereof there was no regard nor account made: the first, because it chanced in a privat place; for T. Martius Postumus reported, That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his court-yard: the second, because it happened in a certain place: for spoken it was, That at Frugella in the house of M. Atreus, a lance or spear which he had bought for his son a soldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more, yea so, as fire consumed nothing thereof. In regard of those publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourse to the books of Sibylla: who out of them declared, That the Consuls should sacrifice twelve head of greater beasts, and they shewed also to what Gods. They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every altar of the Gods should sacrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers. All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed.

After this, the assembly was published for the choosing of Centors. In election there were for this dignity of Centorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius Leuvinus, L. Posthumus Albinus, P. Mutius Scaevola, C. Junius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. These two last rehearsed the people of Rome those for Centors. When as by occasion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of soldiers, than at other times before, the Consuls found much fault with the common people and complained unto the Senat, that the young and able men for service being called would not answer to their names. But C. Sulpicius and M. Claudius two Tribuns of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, saying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Consuls to levy soldiers: many, for corrupt affection and popular Consuls it was not to cally a thing, and namely, such as would be sure to enrol no soldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth, they should see the Pretors (if the Senate were to content, and thought well thereof) whose power of command, and authority of government H was * less than the Consuls, to go through with the multitudes without emperment: So that charge was committed to the Pretors with the great assent of the Senators, but not without some backbiting and detraction of the Consuls. And the Consuls forth to shift and forward that affair, made it known, and protested in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish an act, as touching the review and estimate of every mans demeanour and hability, that besides the ordinary oath of all citizens, they should swear to these points in this form following: Art thou under six and forty years of age? then by virtue of the edict made by the Censors C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius, come forth and shew thy self at the multitudes so often as there shall be any levy taken: and what Censors soever shall happen to be in place, thou shalt appear and be enrolled, in case thou wert not a prest souldier before. Moreover, because the voice went, that many souldiers I of the Macedonian legions were absent from the army, and had obtained large passports without limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published an edict as touching the souldiers enrolled for Macedony, when P. Eltus and C. Popilius were Consul, or any time after. That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled, and registered first under their hands, should within thirty daies repair again to their colours into the province: and whosoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandire, their names should be preferred and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served out their full time. By law required, they would command them to be enrolled souldiers again. By virtue of this edict of the Censors as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporat Towns and places of resort for market and men: handie, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lusty, young, and able men, that their unusual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumbersome to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be sent and employed in supply of the old armies, four legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpinius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the multitudes were accomplished and ended.

Then the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the toober, by reason of the civil causes which required their jurisdictions. The one over the citizens was fall to C. Sulpinius, the other over forrainers to C. Decimius M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Serg. Cornelius Lentulus of Sicily, P. Fontius L. Capito ruled Sardinia, G. Martius Vignulus had the conduct of the navy. And then, I say, to Q. Servilius one of the Consuls fell the government of Italy, and to Q. Martius the other of Macedony. This Martius so soon as the Latine seals were solemnized, departed toward his province immediately. After this, upon the motion of Capito to the LL., ordained, That the Pretors C. Sulpinius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consul, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Consul was thus subjected to the will of the Pretors: yet after the Senat was risen, he stood waiting at the Tribunal of the Pretors, and required them according to the order set down by the Senat to assign him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choice thereof to the Col. himself. This done, the Censors took a review M of the Senat and of the new Senators: and M. Amylius Lapidus was elected president of the Senat: and these were the third Senators that made choice of him consequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the people, and in assigning them, they compelled to return into Macedony those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this assignment, they soon knew who were absent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from souldry: and whose licences they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason: those they forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edict of C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Censors, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine hearts, into the province of Macedony: and this shalt thou do to thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horseback, their sentence was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole estate of Knigts and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coals and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, whereby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Fulvius and An. Posthumus the Censors had taken to farm the renewers, fruits and profits of the City, or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their spear set up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no, nor to be partners, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat: but when they could obtain no comfort from them: to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Censors, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them was offended and bare a grudge against the Censors. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull down a wall standing in the street Sacra over against a publick edifice: pretending that the said wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto the

A the Tribuns for their lawfull help and favour: but when as none of them all but only this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Censors sent to straiten and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the body of the people intended an action against him, and let a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforesaid. By means I say of this debate begun upon such an occasion, when as the old publicans be took themselves for in court to this Tribune, presently there was a bill preferred and subscribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form, That what publick renewers and profits of the State, C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius had to farm let for a rent, or what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purveyed at a price, the same leases and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demises drawn and made. Also that it might be lawful for all men indifferently either to be farmers or undertakers of the premises. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a general assembly and session, to have this bill to be cait by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Censors advanced and put themselves forward to disswade and plead against the bill. So long as Gracchus spoke, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hissed and kept a muttering, so as he was forced by an outcry made by the strict to procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained, that the people there assembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that flag out of the Capitol where this assembly was holden. The next day he kept a great coil and made a foolish tir: first, he interdicted the goods of Tib. Gracchus as condemned and accursed, for that in setting a fine, and straining gages of him, who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, he seemed to set light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him: nay, he protested that he would indite both the Censors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpinius Pretor for the citizens, a day of assizes for their judiciall tryal. The Censors refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this heinous crime of majesty or treason aforesaid, was assigned the * daies immediately before the eight and twentieth calends of October. Upon this, the Censors incontinently ascended up into the Porch of Liberty: where after they had made sure and sealed the publick Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices of the Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clerks and proto-Notaries attending upon that Court, they protested that they would not go in hand with any publick affairs of state, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spoke for himself: and when of twelve centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Censorship and cast him, yea, and many other centuries of the first Classis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very sight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to be good unto the Censors. But that which most of all either flattered or reversed the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himself the other Censor: for that when the commons cried from a parts, that there was no danger growing toward Gracchus, he swore by express words, That if his colleague were condemned, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himself) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this need point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said he would not trouble and molest Gracchus.

This year at the earnest suit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies encreased: a thousand and five hundred families (by virtue of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled: and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were sent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annii Lufus, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The same year C. Popilius and Cn. Octavius Embassadors, who have been sent into Greece, having first read and published at Thebes the act and ordinance of the Senat, carried it afterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponnesus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the wars, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrates, more than that which the Senat had set down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time that they should be eased of those charges and expenses; by which they were impoverished and wasted, whiles every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achaean general council holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in gracious sort: from whence leaving this most loyal and faithful nation in singular good hope of happy estate for the time to come, they passed into Boetia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there: but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and full of natural accusations: in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acarnania. The Acarnanians granted unto these Embassadors a Diet to be holden at Tyrreum: where some debate was between the partakers of divers factions. Some principal men of the States, required that there should be gentlemen received into their Cities, to bridle the wilfulness of those that inclined to the Macedonian nation: others gainsaid this course, and besought the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and confederat Cities should be put to receive that disgrace and dishonour, which usually falleth upon known enemies and those that are conquered by force of arms. And this request was reputed just. Then the Embassadors returned to Larissa unto Habibulus the Pro-consul, for from him they were employed in embassy. Othavins he retained still with him: but Popilius together with a 1000 soldiers or very near, he sent to Ambraclia, thence to lodge for the winter time.

Perseus in the beginning of winter durst not go forth of the frontiers of Macedony, for fear lest the Romans would invade with violence his realm in some place or others, if they found it void and disturbed. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by reason of the deep snow the mountains are unpassable and unsufferable from out of Thessaly, thinking he had then a fit season and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighboring powers, that when he should be averted another way and buied in the Roman war, he might be feared of danger from them: considering that from the parts of Thracia he had peace with Cotyis and likewise with Epirus side (by the means of Cephalus, who suddenly of late was revolted from the Romans;) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanian in war; and seeing only that quarter to infect and annoy Macedony, which regardeth and affronteth Illyricum; and that those Illyrians also were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give entrance unto the Romans; but if he had subdued and tamed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gentius also, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms, might be induced & drawn wholly into society with him: he resolved at length, and with ten thousand footmen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalangites; and other two thousand lightly appointed; and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Stuberæ: from whence after he had provided himself of corn to serve for many daies, and given order that the ordinance and engines of battery should follow after: at the third daies end he lodged near Uscana, the head City of all that Land Poenstia. But before that he offered any assault, he sent certain of purpose to sound and solicit the affections, one while of the Captains of the garrison, and another while of the Townsmen. Now there lay within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrison also of the Romans. And when he saw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and assaid to invell them round about, and so to force the City. And albeit both night and day without any rest and intermission, they pressed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another: whiles some reared ladders against the walls, others threw balls of fire against the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured that tedious and violent tempest: because they hoped that neither the Macedonians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; nor the King on the other side could have so much releafe and relaxation from the Roman war, as to stay there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantlers approach, and the frames of turrets and fabricks erected, their pertinence was over-matched & they began to relent. For besides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to resist, distressed also they were for want of corn, neither had they store of any other provision, as being taken on a sudden, and looking for nothing less than siege at such a time of the year. Therefore when they were pail all hope to be able any longer to resist, C. Cavilius Spolentinus and C. Afranius were sent from the Roman garrison, to crave of Perseus first that he would permit them to depart in their arms, and to carry with them their bag and baggage; secondly, if they might not obtain so much, that he would but give them assurance of life and liberty. The King was more free and liberal to promise, than fast and faithful to perform. For after he had commanded them to go forth and carry with them a l that was their own: the first thing that he did was to disarm them and take away their weapons.

They were not so soon departed out of the Town, but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of 500 men, and also the inhabitants of Uscana rendered themselves and their City. Perseus when he had put a garrison in Uscana, led away the whole multitude of the yielded Townsmen (and those were well-neer as many in number as his own army) and transported them to Stuberæ where, after he had sent the Romans (all besides their Captains) who were 4000 fighting men into sundry cities to be kept in ward, and sold the Ulcianians and Illyrians; he led his army back into Poenstia, intending to be master of Oenone, a Town seated otherwise commodiously, and withal is the very key and highway that openeth passage into the country of the Labæats, within the realm of King Gentius, and where he kept his royal state. As he passed by a strong borough Town well inhabited, named Dracum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that country put into his head, that bootless it was and to no purpose to win Oenone, unless he had Dracum also in his hands, as being a Town situate more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and so soon as ever he presented his army before it, immediately all the inhabitants submitted and yielded. Being much animated and encouraged with this successe, of theirs, which they made far sooner than he hoped or looked for: after that he perceived how terrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought under his subjection eleven other Castles and strong holds, upon the like fear that they were put into. Violence he used against very few of them: the rest yielded willingly: wherein were taken a 500 Roman soldiers, placed there in several garrisons. In great stead and to very good use served Cavilius Spolentinus in all their parties, who evermore gave it out that there had been no cruelty nor rigor exercised upon him and his fellows. At length the King came before Oenone, which could not possibly be won without a set and full siege. For the Town had far more youth and able men

A men within it then the rest, was fortified with a strong wall about it, and defended of the one side with the river called Arcturus, and of the other with an exceeding high hill, and the same of hard and difficult access. All these things considered, the townsmen were in good hope to be able for to make resistance. Perseus, having entrenched the town and cast a rampier round about it, began likewise to raise a terrace & mount from the upper part thereof, to that height as might surmount and over-top the walls. But during the time that this peece of work was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were consumed by divers and sundry adventures, whiles they skirmished off and sallied forth, endeavouring both to defend their own walls, and also to encompass the fabricks and devices of their enemies. And those that remained alive, with tollsome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were pail all service and good for nothing. So soon as the terrace and mount store laid was raised close unto the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nicatoris) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the assault was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen years old he put to the sword: their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the booty and pillage fell to the soldiers share. As he returned from thence with victory to Stuberæ, he sent as Embassadors unto Gentius, Pleuraus the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him) and Amicus a Macedonian of Berbera. Them he gave in charge to declare unto Gentius, what he had achieved against the Romans and Dardanian the summer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to persuade the King, for to be knit in amity with him and the Macedonians. These Embassadors having transmounted the top of the hill Scordus and traversed the wilds and woods of Illyricum, which the Macedonians of purpose had laid waste and desert, to the end, that the Dardanian might have no easie passage either into Illyricum or Macedony after much pain and travail they arrived in the end at Scodra. Now was K. Gentius at Lissus, and thither were the Embassadors sent for, where they delighted their messenger with gracious audience: but they went away with an answer to no effect; namely, that he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans; but his soldiers were empty, and he lacked money especially, to go in hand and enterprise that which he desired. This answer they related unto King Perseus at Stuberæ, at what time as he was most busie in selling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith were the same Embassadors adressed again unto him, accompanied with Glauca one of the Kings guard and liquires of his body, without any mention made of money, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy barbarous Prince to levy war. After this, Perseus vanquished the City Amyra, and once again reduced his army into Poenstia country, and having strengthened the garrisons in Vescana, and in all the forte and peeces about it, he returned into Macedony.

L. Calpurnius Roman lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durst not stir so long as King Perseus was in those quarters; but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover Vescana in the Poenstia country, but was repelled from thence by the garrison of the Macedonians there, and carried away nothing but many adry knock and bloody wound. He retired with his forecote Lychnidum from whence, some few daies after he sent M. Trebennius Fregellanus into the Poenstia country, with a strong power, for to receive hostages of those Cities who faithfully had persisted in amity & friendship. He commanded him also to go in ward to the Partins (for they likewise had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations, the said hostages might be gotten without any stir and trouble. The hostages of the Poenstia were sent to Apollonia, but those of the Partins to Dyrrachium, which in those daies was more usually called by the Greeks Epidamnus.

App. Candianus, desirous to raise out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Illyricum, set in hand to assault Phanotis a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the Athamans and Theprotians (over and above the Roman army) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travail for his pains, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Cleodas, left there with a strong garrison by K. Perseus. Perseus likewise made an expedition to Elymea, and after he had taken a solemn survey of his army about it, he conducted his power to Stratus at the request of the Epirots. This Stratus then, was the strongest City of Illeotolia, situate it is upon the gulf of Ambraclia, near the river Achelous. he advanced thither with 10000 foot: not above 300 horse of them took the fewer with him in number, by reason of the eight steep passages and rugged waies. Being come at the third daies end so far as to the mount Chirus, where he had with much difficulty passed over it, the snow lay so deep, that hardly and with much ado could he find a convenient place to encamp in. From thence he removed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any intolerable way and weather he met: withal in his dimarch and journey forward: so with passing great travail and trouble, of his beasts especially, the second day he arrived at the temple of Jupiter called Nicæus, and there lodged. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachisus, being thither by reason of the deep water: during which time, he made a bridge over and transported his forces; and when he was gone a daies journey onward, he encountered on the way Archidamus, a principal person of the Ætolians, by whose means the City of Stratus was to be delivered up unto him. And that day he lodged upon the frontiers of Ætolia: from whence next morrow he journeyed as far as to Stratus, where having encamped near the river Achelous, he looked that the Ætolians would run out unto him by heaps at all their gates, to yield themselves to his protection: but in head thereof he found their gates shut & garison of the Romans received into the City that very night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius. For the chief of the City (who induced and enforced by the authority of Archidamus while he was present in place, had sent for the K.) became more slack and negligent, by occasion that Archidamus was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunity to the adverse faction, to send for Popilius with a 1000 footmen from Ambracia. In very fit time and to right good purpose came Dinarchus also a captain of the Ætolian Cavalry, accompanied with 600 foot and a 100 horse. Known it was for certain, that he marched toward Syracus, as intending to land and take part with Perseus; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, he joynted with the Romans, and banded against him for whom he set out at the first. Neither was Popilius, among these waverings and inconstant spirits, more secured than he should be; and therefore incontinently gat the keys of the gates into his hands, and possessed himself of the guard of the walls. And for Dinarchus and the Ætolians, together with the youth and able men of Syracus, he bestowed them all in the torresse, under a colour of guarding the same. Perseus, having assaied to parly with them from the hills which commanded the higher part of the City, finding them perverse and obdurate, and seeing them ready to set him farther off with shot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the City, beyond the river Pennarus. There, he called a counsell; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegats of the Epirots, exhorted him there to sojourn and continue; but the captains of the Macedonians contrariwise were of advice that there was no striving with that troublesome and dangerous season of the year, considering their provisions were not ready; and the assailants were like looner to feel the scarcity and want thereof, than the defendants; in regard whereof, and especially for the enemies wintered not far from thence, he dislodged and removed to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reason of great credit of Archidamus among them, received him with a general content. And the same Archidamus was made captain there over a garison of 800 souldiers. And so the King returned into Macedonia, with lesse trouble both of his men and beasts, then he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blown abroad, that Perseus led his forces against Syracus, caused Appius to levy his siege from before Phanotis. And Cleues with a brave regiment of lusty men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hills which were almost unpassable, he flew well near a 1000 of them as they marched heavily onward, and took prisoners above 200. But after that Appius was passed through streights & come into the plain called Eleus, he lay encamped there some few daies: mean while Cleues, accompanied with Philoftratus, the chief commander of the Epirots, passed over into the territory of Antigenes. The Macedonians went about to rob and spoil: but Philoftratus with his cohort set him down in a wait, under a covert and hidden place for the purpose. And when as those of Antigenes issued forth in arms & charged upon the foragers as they ranged over the fields, and dispersed in straggling-wise, pursuing them too eagerly in their flight, they chanced to engage themselves over far within the valley where the enemies lay in ambush: and there to the number of a 1000 of them lost their lives, and almost a 100 were taken prisoners. And so the enemies having pld well in all their enterprises, removed their camp close to that of Appius, to the end that the Roman army might do no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appius (pending the time in these parts to no purpose, and doing no good, after he had discharged the companies of the Chæonians, & as many of the Epirots as were with him, returned in Ilyricum with his Italian souldiers: and when he had distributed them among the confederat Cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himself to Rome by occasion of a certain solemn sacrifice. Perseus sent to Cassandrea for to lie in garison there, a 1000 foot and 200 horse, whom he had caused to come again out of the country of the Penestins. And they that returned from Gentius related kill the same long from him, yet never rested he nor gave over to tempt and importune him, sending Embassadors after Embassadors unto him, knowing right well, that in him rested great importance; yet could not by any means possible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter every way of great consequence.

The four and fortieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the four and fortieth Book.

Quintus Martius Philippus passing through wilds and woods, entered into Macedonia and surprised many Cities. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, threatening to aid Perseus, unless the people of Rome would conclude peace and contrail amity with him: whereat was taken great scorn and disdain. Now when the charge of this war was committed to L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul now the second time for the year following, Paulus before the public assembly of the people praised unto the gods, that all infelicity and cursed fortune coming towards the people of Rome, might be Averted from thence, and light upon his own house. And so having taken a voyage into Macedonia, vanquished Perseus and subdued all Macedonia. A little before he should strike a battell, C. Sulpicius Gallus a Martial Colonel, forewarned the army that they should not wonder, or be troubled in mind at the eclipse of the moon which was to happen the next night following. In like sort Gentius the King, having submitted himself to him, was with his wife, children and kindred, sent to Rome. From Alexandria there arrived the Embassadors of Cleopatra and Ptolomeus King and Queen of Egypt, complaining of Antiochus King of Syria for that he warred upon them. Perseus having solicited Eumenes King of Pergamus, and Gentius King of the Thyrians to aid him, was abandoned, for that he made not true payment of money according to his promise.

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of that spring which immediately followed the winter wherein these events hapned, Q. Martius Philippus the Consul came to Brundisium with five thousand men, whom he intended to transport over the seas for the supply of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Consul) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himself, followed after the Consul to be martial Tribunes in the Macedonian legions. Also about the same time C. Marius Fignus the Pretor, and Admirall of the navy, repaired to Brundisium. Who weighing anchor, looked to sea from Italy together, and arrived the next day at Colophon; but the morrow after that, they put within Ægium, an haven of Ascania. From thence the Consul set sail for Ambracia, where he disbarked and travelled by land to Thessaly. But the Pretor having doubled the point of Lencæ, entered the gulf of Corinth; leaving his vessels at Gruissa journeyed likewise by land to Chalcis unto the naval forces, making such expedition that he crossed through the strait of Besitia in one day. At the same time A. Hofilius lay encamped in Thessaly, near to Palepharsalus. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his souldiers from all licentious looseness, wherewith they were corrupted, and ranged them in within good order of discipline. Also by his faithful courage in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong and injury. Now when he was advertised of the rivall of his successor, he stood with all diligence his forces both men and horse, & gathered together all armor, as well ordered as discipline. And so with a brave army right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Consul upon the way. At their first encounter and meeting was honorable, and heiting as well their own reputation as expedient to the Consul Philip. For the consul turning to his own army, exhorted the souldiers. Some few daies after, the Consul made an oration in a solemn audience of all his souldiers: Wherein in first he began with the pericude of Perseus, committed upon the person of his own father, and devilish means whereby he attained to the crown, also his practices of poisoning, his own murders, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and lacking of assent Cities against the conventions of accord. All which dealings of his he should find on that day (quod necesse erat) the covetous affairs, how odious and cruel they are in the sight also of the immortal gods. He also of his evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of Rome is mounted to that pitch and height of felicity. Then he commended the gods for that State which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedonia, he let it rise to arms, making remonstrances how far greater was the puissance of Philip and Antiochus before, and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to these. Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courages of his souldiers by this manner of exhortation, he began to debate in council as touching the principal and main point of the whole war. And thither repaired unto him from Chalcis, the Pretor C. Marius, after he had taken the charge of the there to lose time; but presently to dislodge and remove directly into Macedonia; that the Pretor should endeavour and call, how at one and the self same time, the Consul commanded his souldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month: and both tenth daies after he had received the conduct of the army, he removed the camp and set forward. When he had gone a daies journey, he called together the guides, and after he had commanded them every one to decalcate them to go aside; and then debated it was in council, which course to take above all others. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythium; others invited to passe over the Cambanian mountains, like as the year before Hofilius the Consul conducted his army; and there were who gave advice to go near to the moor of Ascania. Now there remained yet some part behind of the way, which lay indifferent still and common to all these places; and therefore there consultation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp near to the parting and division of the said waies. So from thence he led the army to Perronia, and let him down between Ascania and Dolbea, for to consult once again all, which way to take.

The phylax here directing the way by the city of Ascania, as the year before between these battles [.]

The same time Perseus knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he meant to come, determined to beset all passages with strong guards. Whereupon he sent ten thousand young and lusty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambanian hills (which the inhabitants themselves call Peloponnesus) under the conduct of captain Asclepiodorus. But he commanded Hippus with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to seize the heights of a certain fort situated upon the marsh Aficus, and is called Lepanthi. Him self in person accompanied with the rest of the forces, lodged first near to Dium; but afterwards seeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horsemen made roads and comes along the strand one while toward Heraclea, and otherwhiles to Phila; and so backward again the same way to Dium. In this mean time the Consul resolved fully to lead his army by that path where we said before that the army of King Philip encompassed sometimes near a place called Otholophus. Howbeit he thought good to send out before four thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be possessed first of the most commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commanded by M. Clandius and Q. Marcius, the Consuls son; and inconsequently all the forces in general followed after. But the way was so steep and difficult, rough, uneven and rugged, that in two daies space, they which were first before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of any thing, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Eudreu. From whence the morrow after they journeyed seven miles forward and seized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they dispatched a courier back to the Consul to give intelligence, that they were come near to the enemy, and seated in a place of safety, commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him for to make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountered the Consul at the Meer Aficus, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himself, as also in regard of the danger of them whom in so few number he had sent before, even through the midst of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himself; and having united all his forces, encompassed upon the foresaid hill which his men already held, on that side which (considering the nature of the ground) was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eye, not only the enemies camp distant from thence a little above a mile, but also the whole countrey as far as to Dium and Philas yes, and all the sea-coast by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yielded a prospect far and neer round about. And this was it that set on fire the fouldiers hearts, when they beheld the whole wealth of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies countrey so neer unto them. In which spirit of cheerfulness when they were earnest with the Consul, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to rest after their wearisome journey. So upon the third day the Consul leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the rest against the enemy. Now had Hippus been lately sent from the King to keep and guard the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battel, and so encountered the army of the Consul and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimble appointed; and the enemies likewise were lightly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmish. So soon as they affronted and encountered one another, presently they fell to lancing of their darts on both sides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at random, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their stomacks whetted and edged against the morrow; and then had they skirmishes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have served them to have displayed their battalions at large: but the top of the mountain was straight and arose to a sharp crest in form of a con or wedge; and hardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men so front; and therefore when some few were in fight, all the rest and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the sides join battel with the like of the other part; yea, and find means to charge their enemies, where the place even or uneven, it skilled not whether. But after that more that day. He who was wounded then killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Roman General was to seek and wilt not what to do; for neither could he stay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was not possible, without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might press upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other means to mind that which was the audaciously enterprised, with as resolute and hardy persistence in executing a thing that otherwhiles proveth well in the end, as if it proceeded from wile and deliberate counsel. And verily to this hard passage and difficult terms they were come, that if the Consul had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might then have received a great foil and overthrow. But K. Perseus as he was cooled and ranged with his cavalry upon the strand near Dium (albeit for the space of 12 miles well neer, he heard the cries and shouts of them that were in fight); neither reinforced the companies by sending fresh fouldiers in place of the wearied, nor shewing himself in person at the battel (which had been a thing of laboury of no small importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 years of age, corpulent besides, and unweildy, performed himself right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior, perishing in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun a bold enterprised to boldly

and

A and having left Popilius for to guard the hill top, passed over places that had no tracks at all to direct them, by sending out before, certain men of purpose to scour and prepare to make a passage. As for Asclapius and Misagamus, he commanded them both, with the auxiliary fouldiers of their own nation to guard them that opened the way before. Then he putting before him in the march the horsemen with baggage, came behind with the legionary footmen in the rearward. No tongue is able to expresse what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the hill, the lampre bories with their backs & carriages tumbled to down one with another: in so much as when they had scarcely gone four miles forward, they winced in their hearts nothing more, then to return the way they came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could see no way, down they cast their riders and governors, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible baying that they made, affrighted their hories especially, until such time as a device was found for their passage. They began first to make the head or entrance of the bridge at the very bow and edge of a steep downsfall: this done, in the lower ground beneath, they fell at in the earth great strong and long polls of wood, two by two distant one from the other, traveling while little more then the largeness of one of their beasts. Upon which rested fall joined [with ten on & more] certain rafters like wall plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks cross over in form of a bridge, had earth and mould cast thereon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made; and so a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entered upon the first bridge aforesaid; but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof, the polls above named were cut in two underneath; to the end that the bridge might fall, and in the case reeling thereof the beast also gently slide, as it were, and he carried therewith as far as the head of the second bridge. Thus some of them slid and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others tumbled upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and level floor of another inch like bridge, by the fall of it in manner aforesaid they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, until such time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more then seven miles that day. And the least part thereof went they upright on their feet but were fain most what to tumble and roll over: no over with the armor and trappings about them; and thus they got forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such sort that he who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a full power, coming against them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a pretty plain; but the place being enclosed on all sides, they had no space and room to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met the morrow following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him: who also were exceedingly fore vexed and plagued with the roughness of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a pass, which the inhabitants call Celipence. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more means to direct them, then the other before; but by use and experience there were grown more skillfull: and better hope they had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the sea. When they were come once down into the plains between Haracenus and Leberthus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hills) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horsemen should quarter. As the King was bethinking himself, it is said that word came. How the enemies were neer at hand: at which news he was so scared, that he leapt out of his bathing vessel, and in haste gat him out of the same, crying aloud, That he was vanquished with our drawing sword and stroke given: neither wilt he be for fear which way to turn him, taking sundry counsels one of another, and commanding he knew not what, sometimes runs and sometimes. In this perplexity he sent for Asclepiodorus (one of his two especial friends) out of the place where he lay in garrison, to go to Pella where all his money and treasure lay; and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Him self, after he had had in great halt betwixt and piled up in his ships, all the gilded images at Dium, to the end that the enemy should make no prize of them, caused with all speed possible to trundle up and to remove to Pythia; & hereby gave occasion, that the enterprize of the Consul which might have seemed rashness (in that he had engaged himself so far, that he could not possibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end no inconsiderate and unadvised deligment. For now the Romans had the choice of few passages through which they might escape away, the one, by Tempe into Thessaly, the other into Macedonia, by the way neer Dium both which before were held by the Kings guards. So as if a resolute and fearless captain could have held out and endured but one ten daies the first appearance and the view of terror that approached the Romans, could never have returned into Thessaly by Tempe, nor found way for conveyance of provision & victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of itself a difficult passage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous. And why besides the straight gullet five miles in length, yielding a very narrow way for one beast to go charged with burden; the rocks of either hands are so steep and upright, that hardly a man is able to look down from them, but his eyes will dazzle, his brain turn, and his head be giddy withall. Moreover, the sound and noise, yea, and the depth of the river Peneus running di-really through the midst of the valley, encreased the fear so much the more. This place so perilous of its own nature, had been holden and guarded with the King's garrisons in four several & distant places. The one kept at the very first entrance, near to Comus, the second at Candulos, a fort impregnable; the third about Lapathus, which also they call Choras; and the fourth was placed even upon the very avenue it self about the midst of the valley, where it is at the straightest, and which may easily be defended with ten men, if there were no more. In this manner (I say) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as well for portage of provisions thither as for return from thence, the Romans must perforce have retired again up to the same mountains from whence they were defended. But as they come down and were not discovered, so being now desired, they could not possibly have gained them again in open view, considering that the enemies had possessed the tops of the mountains; and no doubt the difficulty thereof besides, which they had tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure: so as, being waded thus far into this rash enterprise, there remaineth no means else for them, but to have passed through the midst of the enemies, at Dinn, for to elcape and passe into Macedony, an adventure no doubt, (if the gods had not bereft the King of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being so, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the sea, there is little above a mile space between: the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Baphyrus, which in this place (spreadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain, either the temple of Jupiter or the town it self occupieth: the rest besides, being but a very small place, might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier: besides such low there was of stone reared at hand, and of timber out of the forest, that they might either have raised a K. mure, or framed turrets and such like fabricks in their way. But the K. (whole spirit and understanding was blinded with invidious fear) foreseeing none of all these things, but dismurthering every fort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydna. The Consul perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the lolly and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a courier back toward Larissa unto Sp. Lucretius, willing him to seize those forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemy: and after he had sent Popilius before in spiall to discover all the passages about Dinn, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forward: himself, and the second journey came to Dinn, where commanded to encamp under the very temple; to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himself in proper person entered into the City, which as it was not great, so it was garnished with fair public buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and pasing well fortified besides: in so much as he could not well believe, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secret deceit and treachery lurking underneath. After he had laid there one full day, to espie and see that all coasts were clear, he dislodged and marched on; & supposing verily that he should be provided of sufficient store of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Agia. The morrow after, he took possession of the City Agia, which the inhabitants willingly rendered unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians, (contenting himself only with hostages) he promised to leave their City clear without a garrison, and to permit them to live under their own laws without payment of any tribute. Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, he pitched down his tents last upon the river Ajordan: but feeling and finding still (the farther he went from Thessaly, more and more want of all things, he retired back to Dinn; and then all men saw plainly & made no doubt, to what streights he should be driven, in case he had been clean shut out from Thessaly, considering that it was not late for him to remove far from thence: where he was Perseus having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, checked and railed up the captains of the garrisons and guards aforesaid over the passages; but above all he rebuked Alepidodorus & Hippias most, saying that those two had betrayed unto the Romans the portage to Macedony; whereas indeed no man was more justly to be blamed, for that than his own self.

The Consul after he had discovered a far off from sea a fleet of Roman ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming charged with provision of victuals (for now in his camp the dearth N was great, and brought they were already to extrem want and scarcity.) But he was advertised by them who were entred within the harbor, that the hulks and ships of burden were left behind at Magnesia. Whereupon, being in great doubt what to do (so hard went all things with him for the present, that he had work enough to wrestle with that only difficulty, without being farther encumbered with any empachment from the enemy) behold, in happy time, letters were brought unto him from Sp. Lucretius, importing thus much, That he was master of all the forts and holds neaped upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had found great plenty of corn and other necessaries. The Consul right joyous for these good tidings, set his army on foot from Dinn to Phila, as well to strengthen the garrison there, as also to deal corn among his soldiers; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Dinn.

That departure & journey of his was nothing well spoken of: for some gave out that the General retired from the enemy for very fear, because that if he had staid there till, he should have been forced to a battle: others said, that he had no skill in war, neither in those occurrences, which fortunes wheele turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other; who when occasions and opportunities were presented unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which soon after might not possibly be recovered again. And verily he had not so soon quit the possession of

A of Dinn, but he started and wakened the enemy, and put in his head now at length to regain those matters, which had been lost before through his own default. For bearing that the Consul was departed, he returned immediately to Dinn: where he repaired whatsoever had been demolished and ruin'd by the Romans: the battlements of the wals which were cast down he let up again in the right place; and in all parts fortified the mure and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Empirus, intending that the river it self (which is very hard to be passed over, should serve in stead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in summer season is small and shallow, but in winter it riseth high and spreadeth broad by reason of rain: running also with a forcible current and stream, it furieth with great rocks, and among those stony crags and shelves maketh many whirlpits; by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, store of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath eaten a hollow channel in the mids, the banks of each side are very high and steep upright. Perseus, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debarr'd from all passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the rest of the summer in that fort.

But the Consul in the mean while sent Popilius from Phila into Heraclea with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heraclea standeth about five miles from Phila, situate in the mid-way between Dinn and Tempe, upon a rock that commandeth this river, Popilius, before that he caused his men to approach the wals, sent certain persons of purpose to perswade the magistrats and chief of the City, to make proof of their faithful protection and clemency of the people of Rome, rather then to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice availed not, because they might discern the fires out of the kings camp near to Empirus, whereupon both from the land and sea-side (for the fleet also being arrived anchored near the shore) as well by force of arms as by fabricks and engines of battery, they began to assail the town. Moreover, certain yong and lusty Roman soldiers (making use now in war of exercise, which they had practised in the games Circenses) gat over the wals where it was lowest. The manner was in those daies (before this walt prodigally came up of filling the whole cirque or show-place with beasts fet out of all countries) to devise and seek sundry sorts of publick fights & spectacles to behold, & not running one course with the chariot, and another on horseback, and so on end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among other feats of activity exhibited, the matters and wardens of those exercises and games brought into the race commonly 60 (and otherwhiles more) lusty yong men in arms well appointed. There training in parc represented a show and appearance of two armies encountering and charging one another, in part also the use and practice of a more gentle and elegant exercise then military profession, and coming neerer to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of sword-fencers. These yong gallants, after they had performed other ordinary running courses, put themselves into a four-square Squadron, with the bucklers or targets close couched and joined together over their heads, in this manner: they that were foremost in the front stood bolt upright; the second rank stooped somewhat lower under the other; the third course more then they; and so the fourth until the hindmost knecled on their knees: and by this means they resembled a pavoiade rising up higher & higher, like the pent-house or roof of adifices.

This done, two men well armed, fetching their ran fifty foot or thereabout backward from thence, and seeming to desie and challenge one another, mounted the foresaid pavoiade, ran from the nether end up to the top upon those targets so jointly united and fet close and thick together: and one while they set their countenance as though they would defend the sides and edges thereof, otherwhiles in the mids they seemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and steady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoiade framed and brought close to that part of the wall; and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that stood upon the very ridge thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the walls who being once beaten back and turned down, two ensigns of souldiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavoiade and the other above described was this, that they only who stood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, because their sides and bodies should not be naked and exposed to hurt, but carried them before after the usual manner of fighting men in a battall. By which means, neither the arrows and darts discharged from the wall hurt them afront, nor the shot that light upon their targetence took any hold, but glanced and slid down-ward from the top without doing any harm, like to rain water that shooteth from the ridge of an house, and runneth down the eves. The Consul likewise, now that Heraclea was won, advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending as though he marched toward Dinn, and as if after he had chased and driven the King from thence, he minded to passed forward also into Pyria. But preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the waies fit and handsome, for the carriage of provision out of Thessaly, and to chuse out commodious places for garners: also to build certain bulwarks, wherein they might taken heart again and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazed his spirits, wished then with all his heart, that his commandments had not been obeyed, at what time as a fearful fit he gave expresse charge to call the treasure into the sea at Phila, and to set on fire, the arsenal at Thessalonica. Andronicus being sent for to the same purpose to Thessalonica made no hast to execute his will, but staid until the time for the concele, leaving the King

3 wild beasts out of Africa, with 40 bears, & elephants, were baited to make sport to the people.

When L. Aemilius Paulus and P. Licinius entered their Consulship upon the fifteenth of March, which was the beginning of the year following, the L.L. of the Senat were great expectancy, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian war, which was his proper province. But Pandrus said that he had nothing to propound and put to council, seeing that the Delegates aforesaid were not returned. And at Brundisium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voyage upon the sea been driven back by tempest and cast upon Dyrbachium. But so soon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledge of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within very few daies. Now to the end that nothing may stay and hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the solemnity of the Latine festival holidays. And after sacrifice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senat should no sooner ordein, but he and Cn. Octavius would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and send all things requisite and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forraign nations may have audience given, So when he had sacrificed as the manner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embassadors of Alexandria, from King Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards side and overgrown and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entered into the Senat, and fell groveling and prostrat upon the floor. Their habit and apparrell was not so simple and mournful, their look and countenance not so heavy and sorrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Antiochus now King of Syria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honesty and equity to restore Ptolemy the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his younger brother, who then held Alexandria; and after a victory obtained in sea-fight near Palestina he made a bridge of batty work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid siege to Alexandria: so as by all likelihood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdom. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitifull moan and grievous complaint, beseeching withall the Senat, of their aid and succour to that realm and those Kings, who were such friends to their seignory and dominion. For perfwaded they were that the people of Rome had done too much for Antiochus in particular, & were of that account & authority with all other Kings and nations, that if they would but send their Embassadors to intimate thus much, that the Senat was not well pleased with waging war upon confederat Kings, he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his army clean away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delayed thus to do, then should Ptolemy and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come to Rome with some shameful spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not left their helping hands in that extreme danger of all their fortunes. The L.L. of the Senat moved with compassion at the prayers of these Alexandrians, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius as Embassadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Princes. In commission they had first to go unto Ptolemy, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unless they surceased and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So these three together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forsaide Delegates returned from out of Macedonia, the last day of the festival games to Minerva called Quinquatrus, and not before they were welcome; for so looked for they were, had it not been evenside when they came, the Consuls would immediately have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Senat sat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, that with more danger then profit ensuing, the army entered into Macedonia over those passes and streights, where was no way nor pass, & at all. Item, that the King kept the country of Pieria, into which the Roman army was now advanced, and were to neer encompassed one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipeus between kept them asunder; that neither the K. made offer of battel nor the Rom. were of sufficient strength to challenge & force him to fight; moreover, that the winter had overtaken them (a time unseasonable for warlike exploits) that the soldiers were muzzled and nourished in idleness, not withstanding they had victuals to serve no longer then fix daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble him, are themselves in extrem jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sent thither, or else they draw from thence where they are, into Macedonia. Over and besides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the sea-faring men and mariners were dead of tickles, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest were gone home again to their own houses, inasmuch as there were not men enow to serve the ships; & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & money to put in their purse, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenis & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other end or cause else) were come and gone again, and it seemed the mind of that K. was not well settled and resolved. But as they reported all of Eumenis suspiciously & in doubtful terms, to they assured them of the singular fidelity & constancy of Antius

A his brother. When these Legats had spoke, then said L. Aemilius, let us debate now in council what is to be done as concerning the said war. So the Senat ordeined, that for eight legions, the Consuls and the people should elect an equal number of martiall Tribunes or Colonels, the one as many as the other; and that none should be created and advanced to that place for that year, but such as had born some honourable dignity; then, out of all those Tribunes thus elected, that he would himselfe also, that after the solemnity of the Latine feast performed, L. Aemilius the A. child was joyed in commission with them, to wit, L. Anicius the Prator and L. chief Justice for strangers. And ordeined it was, that he should pais into Illyricum about Lychnidum, for to succed mandment to enroll eleven thousand foot, Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horsemen, and to send letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll six hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to send with all convenient speed to his Colleague into Macedonia, so as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the same full and well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and bestowed in sundry garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be casted and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put to set out and find 16000 foot and 800 horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Anicius of 5000 foot, and 300 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers, Licinius the Col. was appointed to defend and keep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take besides of allies ten thousand foot, and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senat were accomplished, L. Aemilius the Col. went forth of the Senat house into the common place before the assembly of the people; where he made a speech unto them in this wise following: "Me thinks I perceive and see, my good friends and Citizens of Rome, that ye have shewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my translation that the Province of Macedonia is faine to my lot; than either at the time that I was declared and elected Col. or that day whereupon I first entered into government: & for no other reason in this world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonian war, which hath so long continued, may be brought by my means to such an end as befecmeth the great & sad and majesty of the people of Rome. And for mine own self I have good hope, that as the gods in favour have directed this sortilege, so they will be present and propitious unto me in performing the service. In these matters, I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope, but this one thing I am assured of, yea and I dare affirm and promise on my own head, that I will endeavour myself and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be in vain conceived. As for all things necessary and requisite to this war, both the Senat hath ordeined & also, for that they have thought good I should depart immediately (for which my self am well pleased and contented, neither in me there shall be any delay) my Colleague C. Licinius, he hath the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, see that whatsoever I shall write either to the Senat, or to you, ye believe for true: as for running rumours which have no certain author, give no ear and belief thereto; neither feed them with your foolish credulity. For now adades verily, (a thing that I have observed to fall out ordinarily in this war) there is no man set to the sword by the common bruits that are blazed abroad, but his spirit and courage may be thereby quailed and danted. In all meetings now, yea, and at every board (I would not eleye) shall have them, that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedonia; that know where they are to lodge and encamp; what commodious places are to be seized and kept with garrisons; at what time and through which pass the enemy must be made into Macedonia; where the garners and storehouses for corn should be built and set; which way by land and sea both, the provisions of victuals ought to be brought, when the time serveth to encounter and fight with the enemy, and when to sit still and rest. Neither are they content to set down and pronounce, what is to be done for the better; but if ought hap to be managed otherwise than they have judged expedient, they are so bold as to controll the Col. yea, and ready to commence process against him judicially. These are throwd hindrances, I may tell you, to warriors & men of action. For all men have not the gift of resolution and constancy to neglect the speech and talk of men, as sometimes Fabius had, who chose rather to have his authority & command diminished and impaired by the folly and vanity of few low people, than with their favourable applause and good opinion to manage his affairs but untowardly. Yet take me not so, as if I were a man that would have my captains to be admonished and advised by others; nay contrariwise, of this judgment I am, that he who worketh all by himselfe-wit & followeth only his own head is self-willed and proud, and nothing sage & wise. What is then to be done? First, in mine opinion, Generals and Commanders of armies, are to be instructed by discreet and prudent men; by such as are skilful in profession in feats of arms and military science: by those also that by long practice are thoroughly experienced: nay, more than that, they are to be taught and counselled by them, that are usually present and conversant in the execution of affairs, who daily see the advantage of "the Cof should have a speedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

• The last of February.

During these occurrences in Italy, Perseus who (because he was to be at the charges of disburfing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to adjoyne unto him Gentius King of the Illyrians: so soon as he perceived that the Romans were entered the Straights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard: thought good now to make that sure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promised by his Em-bassador Hippas three hundred talents of silver, with condition also, that for security hostages should be put in of both parties interchangeably: he sent Pr. Pantuncus one of his most trusty friends to dispatch, and make an end of this affair. This Pantuncus met the Illyrian King at Medon in the Country of Labentia: where he both took an oath of the King, and also received his hostages.
 Gentius likewise sent his embassador, named Olympia, to demand the semblable oath of Perseus, and require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purpose to receive the money, who also by the advice of the said Pantuncus were to go in embassage with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Moretus. But they had in charge and commission after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes: & not before. E Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be solicited and induced to take arms against the Romans by using the name of these two KK, at once: and this account they made, that in this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them, they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea.
 When these Illyrians arrived, Perseus departed with all his Cavalry from before the river Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountered them near Dinna: there were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the light and midst of the Cavalry, whom the K. of purpose would needs have to be present at this accord of association made between him and K. Gentius, supposing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hostages were taken and taken in the presence of them all. They also, who were to receive the money were sent to Pella M where the K. his treasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian embassadors had commandment to embark at Thessalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes: who assured them by the means of Dion & Polyarchus, two principal personages of that City, that the Rhodians were prest and ready to war. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eumenes & also unto Antiochus, such advice and counsel in common, as the present condition wherein their affairs stood, might minister & afford argument: namely: "That a free City and a K. were twofold by nature, enemies that possibly could not fort together:
 "That the people of Rome went in band with them severally one after another, & that which was "a greater indignity & unsupported, used the force of KK to overthrow the state of KK. For so, N
 "by the aid of Antiochus they had brought his father Philip to ruin by the help likewise of Eumenes,
 "and partly also of his father Philip. Antiochus was defeated; & even now against himself both Eu-
 "menes and Prusias were put in arms. If the kingdom of Macedonia were once subverted, have at "Africa next: which the Romans have in some part seized already for their own use, & colour
 "of enfranchizing Cities, & letting them free: & then they will not leave us till they have Syria "too. For now is Prusias preferred in honour before Eumenes: & Antiochus for all his conquest is "chased & debared out of Egypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him "undertaken & achieved. In these regards Perseus adverted each of them to consider & provide "therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him, or else to hold them for the com"mon enemies of all KK, in case they persisted still in so unjust a war. The commission that the Em-
 "bassadors had to Antiochus was apt & open: but unto Eumenes, his embassador was sent under a "pretence of ransomfing certain captives; but practised there were under hand more secret complots;
 "which caused Eumenes even then, to be suspected & odious unto the Romans, yea & charged after"ward with more grievous matters, although unwarily. For he was reputed little better than a traitor
 "to a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both he & Perseus strove who could compass
 "surprize, & overtake one another better in fraud & avise. Now there was one Cydus a Cretensian,

A an inward & most secret friend to Eumenes: this man had continued first at Amphipolis with one Chimerus a contrivance of his, who served under Perseus in the wars: and afterwards at De-metrias conferred with another named Macton: also with a certain chief person, called Antiochus who at this time was sent, had beforetime been employed in two several embassies to the same Eumenes. These secret communications and embassages were badly spoken of: but no man knew what was concluded between the two KK. However, thus the case stood: Eumenes as he had have the victory of the Romans: not so much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers, as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence, & emulation there was between these two Princes, that Eumenes could never abide to see Perseus for to purchase so great wealth, & so much honour, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romans the same moreover, that Perseus from the first beginning of this war fought by all means possible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than other; because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains: as the and difficult a war. Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he declined & fa-weaker in fear: & therein desired he to shew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & purchase to aid the Romans either by land or sea; another whilst to be a means for peace and to treat
 C with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to sit still: he capitulated (I say) for 1500 talents; making semblance and shew, that for the assurance both of the one and the other ready he was not only to swear, but also to put in good and sufficient hostages. Perseus was the willingest man in the world to set in hand with this, as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear: and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they should upon their delivery and receipt be sent into Crete. But when they came onco to talk of the money aforesaid, he hasted and flunk at that: and to lay a truth, either of these two sums (between Princes of so great name and honour) was but a D bable and dishonest consideration: a thing much unfitting (I wis) the giver, and more the receiver.
 Perseus verily for his part, in hope to purchase peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expence of so much money: yea, he said that he would make payment thereof when the temple of Samothracia, Eumenes again, considering that the said Island was an appurtenance to the dominion of Perseus, could not see but that it was all one for it to lie there and in Pelus, and therefore was earnest to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying infamy and discredit? As for Perseus, he not only let fall this design and lost this opportunity; and but by his nigardice only when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his money E (sure enough, or peace for it, (which indeed he should have bought, if it had cost him the one half of his kingdom, and being once received into grace & favour of the people of Rome) he might have a piece of money for a bribe, and so justly have set the Romans upon his top: but also the association with King Gentius which now was at the point of a contract, was neglected; yea, and a might-ful army of Gauls spread at that time all over Illyricum and presented unto him, was even then reservative ten thousand horsemen, and as many foot, and those so well practised and so good of foot-
 F (Illyas) when the riders were unhorsed and slain, could vault & mount on the empty horse backs ready to fight in their turns. These had bargained to have to pay every horseman ten Philo-pates [of gold] paid down aforehand and a footman five and their Captains a thousand. Perseus departed from his laager lying near the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own force met these coming upon the way, and caused proclamation to be made in all towns and villages near the high ways, To made ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that there were plenty of corn, of wine, and cattle. Himself brought with him horses and trappings, and fine souldiers caskets to bestow as presents upon the chief of them, with some little sprinkling of gold to deal among a few of them, supposing that all the rest besides of common souldiers, might be drawn on, and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the City of Amman, and G Desudabab the country of Madon, and rested there expecting the payment of the money aforesaid, according to covenant. But Perseus sent unto them Antigonus one of his gallants and counsellors, to call in the multitude of the army to dislodge and remove to Byzantium, a place score and fifteen miles from the river Axius and the Kings camp. And when Antigonus had delivered unto them this mandat as he had in charge, and added besides, with what care and diligence the King had laid his provisions by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and with what gifts of apparell, silver, and horses, he purposed to receive and entertain their Captains at their first coming unto him: as for that (say they) we shall take knowledge thereof when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether ye have brought with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the souldiers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was set scowling: then the said Clondius their Prince, Go your waies then (qd, he) and tell your King and Matter, that the Gauls, whels they may receive the gold, and hostages besides for their security, will not stir one foot forward. Relation being made hereof unto the K, he called his Council: and when it was soon seen what they all would advise him to do himself, who could skill better to keep his money together, than hold the royall estate of his kingdom, began to enter into a discourse of a disloyalty and savage nature of these Gauls: making remonstancie, how he had experience by the calamities and losses of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them within Macedony, for fear the Gauls would be found worse neighbors than the Romans were enemies; Five thousand horsemen are sufficient (qd, he) and so many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them, for their number. But every man saw well enough, that it was the wagging of such a number that he feared and nothing else: but when no man durst give him counsel, albeit he seemed to ask their advice, Antigonus was sent again with a message unto the Gauls, That the King stood in need of five thousand horsemen and no more, as for all the rest, he weighed them not. When these Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great scorn and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing; but Clondius redemanded, Whether he would make present pay to those five thousand according to covenant, yea or nay? but seeing that he was to seek, and made shifts to avoid a direct answer, he let this deceitful messenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his person (a thing that Antigonus himself would scarcely have thought could possibly have been): And so after they had given the walle unto those parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river Ister, Which power of men it it had passed the Straights of Peribabia into Thessaly against the Romans (although Perseus had not stirred at all), but siten still at E-nipheus might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and encompassed the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the towns utterly, whiles Perseus held the Romans play at Empire that they could not relieve and succour the Cities of their allies and confederates. Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, considering, that there was no tarrying for them, after that Thessaly was lost, which nourished and maintained their army: and pass forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perseus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, so he quailed not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancy of their aid. By the same miserable pinching of his, he estranged also the heart of K. Gentius from him. For when as at Pella he had paid 300 talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same, well content he was that they should lea up that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pantander ten talents, and commanded him to deliver the same to the K, in person: as for the rest he signed up with the lea of the Illyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convey thereof, in going with it to take small journeys, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Macedony, there to rest and attend the messengers from him. Gentius, after he had received as earnest that small portion of the whole sum aforesaid, being called upon continually by Pantander and set on to provoke the Romans by some hostility or other, made no more ado, but committed to prison M. Perperna and L. Petilius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embassage. Which when Perseus once heard, he had enough, and thought verily that Gentius had done that, whereby of necessity he must be forced to wage war with the Romans: and thereupon sent out presently to call those back who had the carriage of the foresaid talents: as if he had studied and sought for nothing more, than to reserve as great a booty as possibly he could, for the Romans to enjoy, after that they had vanquished and subdued him. Eropan returned likewise from Eumenes, and wit not what had been contrived secretly between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, they themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eumenes advertised the Consul so much, for avoiding of all suspicion.

Perseus after the return of Eropan from Eumenes was much dismayed and cast down. Whereupon, he sent Antenor & Callippus (admirals of his navy) to Tenedos with forty pinnaces, unto which number five Gallions were adjoynd: who from that coast dispersing themselves all about the Islands Cyclades, might wait and guard the lighters and hoies charged with corn, as they sailed to Macedony. These ships were put to sea at Cassandria, and first they fell with the havens that lie under the foot of the mountain Atbos, and from thence passed to Tenedos with pleasure in calm sea: where finding certain Rhodian open ships riding in the harbour, they spake contemptuously to Eudamus their Admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards upon knowledge, that fifty hulks of theirs on another side were shut up and pent in by the war-ships of K. Eumenes, (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Damius) he turned about in all haste, & dispersed the enemies ships with a sudden terror that he put them in, & sent the said hulks & vessels of burden into Macedony, with a convoy of ten brigantines to wait them over, with this charge, That after they had conducted them past all danger into place of safety, they should return again to Tenedos. After nine daies they retired toward the fleet anchoring then in the rode of Sigeum. From whence they crossed over to Sabota, an Island lying between Elyx and Athor. It fortuned, that the morrow after the fleet was arrived at Sabota, five and thirty ships which they call Hippogages (serving for the transporting of horses) which came from Elyx, having aboard certain horsemen of Gaul and their horses, made head toward Phoenicia cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedony. And they were sent from Eumenes to Antenor, Antenor being advertised by a signal given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under sail in the open sea, looled from Sabota: and between the cape of Erythraea and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, he encountered them. The admirals of K. Eumenes thought nothing less, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagine! one while they were Romans, otherwhies, that it was Attalus or some sent back from Attalus. B. who from out of the Roman camp were sailing toward Periponni. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaces, who they approached nearer, rowing also and making head full against them they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid, as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unwieldy and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brook the very sea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearer to the firm land saved themselves by swimming to Erythraea; others set up their sails, and being call upon the Island Chios, forsook their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the barks discharged their armed souldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them; some in the way as they fled others before the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred Gallages, or very near, lost their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 200 taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians hanged and cut the strings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best and fairest horses, together with the prisoners, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet for aide, but afterwards were forward to Phoenicia. The fleet staid about three daies under the City, sooner than they looked for, they let up sail in the Aegean sea for Delos.

D. In this while the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, & C. Decimus, and C. Hostilius, departed from Chalcis, and arrived with three Quinquere me gallees at Delos, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaces, and five royall Quinquere me gallees of K. Eumenes. The holiness of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides, the sailors and mariners of K. Eumenes conversed together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them true and luxurle of hospitality.

Antenor the admiral of K. Perseus, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinel, that certain ships of burden were seen a far off in the sea, set sail & made after them himself with part of his pinnaces, and part of them he bestowed in wait among the Cyclades, and saving those that E directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled them all. Popilius did the best he could, and Eumenes with his ships likewise, to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, decreased and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, who carried the greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigantines, which sailed to and fro ranging over the Aegean sea, and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjunction and allocation of the two K. Perseus and Gentius, together with a rumor that ran of the Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dion and Polyarchus, who took part with Perseus, took more courage, and heart unto them: by whose means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also pronounced F ed openly it was, that by their authority they would make an end of the war: in regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new generals were arrived into their Provinces: C. Aemilius the Consul into Macedony; Othavins to the navy at Orontus; and Ancinus into Illyria, whose commission was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Pleuraeus K, blood by father and mother both, and Caridamius only by the mothers side. This half brother he less suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father: but as for Plator he murdered, together with two especial friends of his Etrius and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end that he might reign in more safety and security. The voice goeth that he carried ambitious eye to that brother of his, for that he had espoused Eriata the daughter of Homonus the Prince of the Dardanian nation: and the more likelihood this carried with it, after he married the damoelle, indeed, When he had made away Plator, and rid himself of the fear that he might have of his brother, he began to molest and oppress his own natural subjects: and as he was by nature given to violence, so that indisposition of his he set on fire with untemperate drinking of wine. But as we said before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all his forces together.

unto Lissus, to the number of 15000 armed men, and sent his brother from thence with 1000 foot and 50 horse against the Cavians, for to subdue that nation either by force or fear, while himself led his army five miles against the City Bassania from Lissus. Now were the Bassanians confederate allies of the Romans; and therefore when they were first solicited by messengers to yield they resolved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Cervanius he was peaceably and friendly received at his first coming into Durium, a town of the Cavians. But Cervanius another City made the gates fast against him; and as he gave the walls to the territory about it, some of his soldiers stragling here and there, were by the peasants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them.

And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own army, the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apollonians, and Dyrhachians, dislodged out of the place, where he had wintered, and encamped near the river Gennusus. For hearing of the alliance made between Perseus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Roman ambassadors whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him. Anicius the Praetor being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what terms the affairs stood in Illyricum, dispatched letters beforehand to Appius, willing him to attend at Gennusus for his coming; and so within three daies after came himself to the camp there; and to those aids which he had of his own he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partians. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agathus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illyricum, principally for to levy the siege before Bassania; but this design projected by him, was emperched by a bruit that was blown of certain pinnaces which waited and spoiled the sea-coasts. A fleet they were together of eighty sail, sent from Gentius by the instigation of Pantacrus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Durhachium. Then the fleet which being surrendered, they submitted also, and yielded themselves. And so consequently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblance; and the inclination & disposition of mens minds that way, was much set forward by the clemency and justice of the Roman Praetor which he used towards all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and seat-town of the war; not only for that Gentius had seized upon it for his own self, as the chief strength and fortrefs of all his realm, but also because it was the strongest piece of all the Labeates nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Clanfa, which runneth along the East side of the City, and Barbana on the West, arising out of the marsh Labeatus. These two rivers joyn in one and are discharged together into the great river Orindus: which springing from the mountain Scodrus, and increased still with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, fall at length into the Adriatick sea. This Scodrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters: on the east it hath Dardania, under it, on the South Macedony, and Illyricum on the West. Albeit, this town was strongly fortified, by the natural site of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person; yet the Roman Praetor (encouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the total war would be answerable to so happy beginnings, and that a sudden terror also would serve him in much stead and prevaile) approached the walls of the town with his army ready embattelled, and displayed his banners against it. Now if they had shut their gates, and defended their walls and turrets over the gates, with armed guards belowed accordingly surely they had repulled the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterprise: Clean but they issued forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animosity and courage than they maintained it with persistance. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chase huddled by heaps together as they fled, after 200 & above were slain in the very straight entrance of the gate, they put the rest within in such a fright, that Gentius incontinently sent unto the Praetor as Orators, T. nicus and Belus the principal persons of that nation to treat and intreat for a luse of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in council and be advised as touching the main estate of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grant for three daies, and the Romans lay encamped from the City half a mile; Gentius took a bridle, and falling along the river Barbana, called into the lake or mear of the Labeates, as if he had sought some secret place to consult in. But as it appeared afterwards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Cervanius his coming, who was said to be near at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent. But when this rumour was over-blown & vanished to nothing, down the river he went again with the stream the third day after in the same vessel to Scodra, and sent couriers before him to the Praetor, requiring leave to parley & commune with him: which being granted, he entered into the camp. First, he began his speech with accusing and condemning his own folly: in the end his last refuge was to pour out prayers and shed tears: and so humbling himself at the Praetor his feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Praetor at the first had him take a good heart unto him and be of good cheer, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably feasted that day by the Praetor. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Cassius, a martiall Colonel: and thus received he of K. Perseus only ten talents (a mean reward and hardly sufficient to content a simple word-pier) to engage himself into a world of danger; and being a K, as he was, to fall into this extrem calamity and misery. Anicius having entered upon Scodra, first before all other things, took order that that the two Embassadors aforesaid, Pantacrus and Perseus should be sought out and brought unto him: whom after he had restored to their pitting estate and reputation, he sent Perseus presently to apprehend the friends and kinsfolk of the King: who took his way directly to Medra, a City of the Labeates, and brought with him into the camp at Scodra Elleus the Kings wife, with her two sons Scodrus and Pleuratus together with Cardantius the K. his brother. Thus Anicius having ended the Illyrian war within the compass of thirty daies, sent Perseus to Rome with tidings of this victory: and within few daies Gentius himself after him together with his mother, his wife and children, his brother, and other LL of the Illyrians. This was the only war achieved, and brought to an end, before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the management of these affairs, Perseus also was in great fear and affright, by reason of the coming of L. Emilius a new Consul (who as the voice went, marched against him with great menaces) together with Octavius the Praetor. Neither was he less terrified with the Roman navy and the danger of the sea-coasts. Eumenes and Athenagoras had the keeping and command of Thessalonica with a small garrison of two thousand targetteers. Thither he sent Captain Andreas also, with commandment to encamp close to the very harbor where the ships lay in rode, unto the end that in what part soever they heard the enemies ships were arrived, they might incontinently advance to the succour of the peasants and country people. Five thousand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garrison at Pythium and Petra, under the conduct of Thibius, Theraps and Midon. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Emilia: because it was passable over the very channell on dry foot, and to the end that all the multitude should be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoining, to bring victuals into the camp. The soldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by

Finally, the water-bearers in leather bags or bottles, were commanded to follow him to the sea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they flood to dig about him in one place, and some in another, a pretty distance under. The exceeding high hills all in open view (that they intended within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining into the sea, were intermingled with the sea-water. They had scarcely sunk through the uppermost course of sand above when they might see small fountains to boil up, at the first troubled, but afterwards they began to yield thier and clear water in great abundance; by a speciall gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this occurrence also increased the name and reputation of the Captain with the martiall Tribunes and the principall most ranks, marched to recognize and view the passages, and to see where the armed men might defend with ease, and where they might with least trouble mount up the bank on the farther side. When he had taken a sufficient survey hereof, he forecalt & gave direction aforehand for all things to be done in the army in good order without trouble and tumultuous noise, even at the very beck and commandment of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to all at once it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing; and so receiving an uncertain signall and commandment, some put more of their own head to that which was commanded, and others do less again for it: and so there arise from all parts dissonant cries, and by this means the enemies know sooner whereabouts they go, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this confusion, he ordained that every martiall Colonel should give a secret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion, and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and so forth every one should deliver unto each Centurion what was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the rearward behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and custome, forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets to their sentinels: for that the watchmen went not out to fight, whereby he needed any armour, but to keep watch; that when he desired the enemies coming, he might retire himself and raise others to take arms. Item, he ordained that the helmetters or morioners should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: and when they were weary, take a nap and sleep: to the end that their glittering armour might be discovered at of by the enemy, whereas himself could not see far before him. The manner also of warding in the day time armed, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled; it tell out so that in summer daies when ordinarily the sun is extrem and scorching hot, both horse and man became weary and languished upon being abiding so many hours in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being fresh, although they were but few in number set upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. Hereupon he commanded that the morning guard should break up at noon, and others increased in their places for to ward in the afternoon. By this means the enemy fresh and in heart could never take them weary and so charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publick assembly gathered together that his will was, that these orders should be observed accordingly, he delivered unto them a speech, much resembling the former Oration which he used before to the people within the City of Rome. Namely, "That the General of an army ought only to foresee and provide for all that is meet to be done, sometime by himself, otherwhiles with those whom he hath joyned affiliates unto him: as for such as are not called to be of his council, they ought neither in public like nor in privat to shooke their bolgs and give their advice. Three things indeed the fondler was to care and provide for: namely, to have a body most strong and nimble; withall his armor and weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all allies to execute any commandment on a sudden. For all things else he ought to know, that the gods immortal and his Generall will take care: forasmuch, as in that army wherein the soldiers, the Consul, and his chief commander, suffer themselves to be carried away with rumours and bruits of the common sort; it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part (according to the duty and devotion of a captain Generall) he would endeavour and provide to give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire after any future thing, but to looke as the signal is given, then every man to perform the service of a doubty soldier and valiant warrior. After these good precepts and instructions, he dismissed the assembly: and the old soldiers themselves confessed, in many plain terms, that they had taken forth a lesson that day as young and raw novices; yea, and learned in military profession that, which they never knew before: neither thewed they only by these and such like words, with what content and general liking they heard the Col's speech, but also testified the same by present deed and visible effect. For immediately, you should not have seen over all the camp one matidle and doing nothing: some fell to whet and sharpen their swords; others their cuiraces and corselets: some fitted and buckled their harness to their bodies, and tried how they could better their limbs and rule their joynts under it: some shooke their pikes and couched their javelins; others brandished their swords and lookt that they were wharp at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them, that upon this first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would every way conflict, either to achieve a brave victory; or to die an honourable death.

enter into conflict, either to achieve a brave victory, or to die in honourable death. Perseus also on the other side, perceiving that upon the arrival of the Consul, and the beginning of the spring together, the Roman camp resounded and rung again with their firing and rattling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Phyllis of armour, and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to (spie (doubt) some way This encouraged the Ro- or other for passage mans hearts, and danted not a little the Macedonians and their King. At the first, Perseus endeavoured to suppress secretly and (top the bruit and fame thereof, by sending out orders of purpose to Pausanias (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wise to approach the camp. But by this time were certain children fere brought by their own parents among the Illyrian hostages: and look how much more careful order was taken to conceal all, to much the sooner was every thing let abroad and blured out by the prattle and babble of the Kings servants attending about his person.

his person. About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very same charge and commission as touching peace, which at Rome had let the L.L. of the Senat in exceeding heat & cholery; but far worse audience had they in the councill of the camp, & with greater discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust out by head and shoulders without any answer at all; the Coſ. pronounced, That he would shape them an answer alter fifteen daies, and not before. Mean while (that it might appear what aयोग reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about the manner of making war. Some were of opinion to debate in Councill as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and ancients) to give the assaile, and for the munitions and defence, planted upon the bank of the river Empgus; for that the Macedonians were never able to resist, if they came upon them lustily and charged them by thick troops: for why? no longer ago (say they) than the year before, diseized they had been of so many holds both higher and better fortified and the same holden with strong garriſons. Others were of mind, that Oſtavius the Admiral should with the fleet sail to Thysſalonica & by laying wait the maritime coasts, to cut off & weaken the kings forces; to the end, that upon another war shew'd from behind at their backs the K. might be withdrawn & rained about to defend the heart of his realm. and thereby forced in some sort to open & lay naked the passage over the river Empgus. And Oſtavius himself was in this judgment, that the bank as well by the naturall site thereof, as for the scones made upon it by mans hand was inteperable and not to be gained: & besides the engines planned every where thereupon, he heard say, that the enemies had the sight and skill to discharge all kind of shot far better and shoot more dead sure: but the intention of the General Antius was wholly bent another way: and after he had dissolved the assembly of his council, he called upon him the Merchants of the Perhæbians namely Sclanius and Memphilius (men of approved fidelity and wisdom) and of them in greater secret enquired, What kind of passages there were over into Perhæbia: when they answered, That the waies were nothing difficult and dangerous, but only that they were kept and beset by the Kings guards: he conceived some hope that if he assailed them by night with a valiant company, and took them suddenly at unawares before they looked for him, he might chase those garriſons from their holds: for darts, arrows, and all other shot, served to little or no purpose in the dark, when a man cannot see his mark ar off before him; but close sword-fight, hand to hand pell mell, was it that must do the deed: wherein the Roman souldier had no fellow. Minding therefore

A therefore to use those two as guides, he sent for Othavius the Pretor: and when he had declared unto him the effect of his designment, he commanded him to sail with his fleet to Heraclea: and to have with him victuals baked and dressed to serve a thousand soldiers ten days, himself sent out P. Scipio Nafica and Q. Fadius Maximus his own son, with five thousand select soldiers to Heraclea as if they were to be embarked (for to waite the maritime coast of Macedonia lying to the westward within the country, according as it had been before debated in Councill: & secretly under-hand, they were given to wit, that there were viands and victuals in the fleet prepared for them, to the end that nothing should stay their expedition. Then the journey, who were to conduct them in their way, had commandment, so to cast their gifts and goodies, that by three of the clock in the morning the third day, they might alight Pythium. Himself in his own person the next morning, with intent to amule the King and keep him from all regard of other enterprises, early by the break of day began to skirmish with the enemies guards in the very midst of the channell and place of the current. The light armour and forlorne hopes as well of the one side as the other, maintained the fight: for it was not possible for soldiers heavily armed at all peeces, to skirmish in the channell so uneven as it was. The defence from the banks off either hand to the forelaid channell contained somewhat less than three hundred paces, or little better than a quarter of a mile: the middle place of the stream between hollowed and eaten with the current. In some place more, in others less took up little above a mile. In this middle plot was the skirmish, maintained within the view and eye of the King, of one side, who looked upon them from the rampier of the camp; and on the other of the Consul, who beheld them standing with his legions. The Kings auxiliaries lightly armed, fought better off as by the means of their darts and other shot. The Romans were more firm and steady, yea, and better defended with their round bucklers or Ligurian shields. About noontide the Consul commanded to found the retreat unto his men: and so for that day the fray warred, not without much bloodshed on both sides. The next morrow by sun-rising they fell to it again, and fought more eagerly by reason that their blood was up, and their stomaks sharpened the day before: but the Romans received hurt not only by them with whom they entered into fight, but much more also from a number of those who stood in turres and petty towers erected here and there: who discharged at them all kind of darts and shot. But hurtled flumes especially. And when they approached once near to the bank where the enemies were, their ballers levelled out of engines, commanded and retched even them that were outmost, and farther off.

D. The Consul having lost that day more men by many than before, caused them to retire to somewhat later than the former day. The third day he forbore to fight, but turned aside toward the nearer quarter of the camp, as if he minded to assay passage by an arm of the river that bended to the sea. Perseus having before his eyes

Now was the season of the year past / fun stead in summer, & near unto the hour of noon stead in the day so they journeyed in a way full of dust, when the sun was ex. ceding hot; and even now they began to feel thirst and weariness already; but it seemed evidently, that when high noon was come indeed, they would be more troubled with the one and the other. Whereupon Amelius resolved not to prevent his men thus tormented and afflicted, unto the enemies all refresh and in heart: howbeit, so that per they were on both sides and to eager upon fight that the Confuld. B as much need by some cunning call or other to deceive and beguile his men as the Confuld. C enemies. Before they were all embattell'd and put in array: he was earnest with the martiall C bunes, and called upon them to make haste and put them in order: himselfe rode about from rank to rank, and by his comfortable words encouraged, and in ended the hearts of his souldiers to fight. At the first they were all very lusty and called for the signal of battell; but afterwards as the heat of the weather increased, so their wittiges seemed les vigorous, and their voices more hea- P vy and dull: yea, some of them stood leaning on their targets, and rested themselves bearing up- P per their javelins. Then he made open shew of his meaning, and in plain terms commended the P formost companies in the vanguard, to measure out the forefront of the camp, and to lay down P their baggage: which when the souldiers perceived, some of them there were who joyed ex- P plicitly for that they had not forced them to fight, so weary as they were with travelling and during P that most scorching and burning heat. About the General rood his lieutenants with the captains P of strangers, and Attalus himselfe among the rest. All of them allowed and thought well of the P matter, all the while they thought no other but that the Confuld would verily fight: for he had P not so much as made them acquainted with this delay and lingering of his. But then seeing the ca- P suality and the purpose changed, all theret held their peace: only Nasica of them all was so ha- P dy and bold as to tell the Confuld his mind and admonish him to take heed, that he suffered not P the enemy by avoiding fight, to slip and escape out of their hands, like as he had mocked and be- P guiled other Generals before him: for he feared much, lest he would dislodge, and depart in P the inland middle parts of Macedony: so as the army should be put to wander and danger in P @ about through the blind lanes and over the narrow straits of the Macedonian mountains: P like as it hapned to other Captains before him. And therefore he counselld him in good foun- P deds, while he had the enemy within the open plain field, to charge upon him and not to lose P the opportunity of a goodly victory now presented. The Confuld, nothing at all offended with P this frank advertisement of so noble a young gentleman, said no more but thus unto him: "The P "daphath been (Nasica) when I carried that spirit with me which you do at this present; and the "time will come when you will be of that mind, of which I am now. Taught I am by experience "in many adventures and casualties in war, to know, when it is good time to fight, and when it is "better to forbear and sit still. For this present needeth it is and booteth (standing as we do now

 "arranged in order of battell) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to think it better
 "to be quiet and not to stir this day: another time demand the reasons thereof: and rest content"ed I advise you, with the authority and credit of an old warrior and experienced Captain. The "young man was blank and said not a word: persuaded he was doubteless, that the Col. law some "impediments to lay the battell, which to himself appeared not. Paulus, when he perceived that the "camp was tier and quartered out, & the carriages bestowed accordingly, drew first out of the reere-
 "guard the Tribuni; then afterwards the Principes, whiles the Alafrati or pikes kept their standing "still in the vanguard (if haply the enemies should offer battell): at the last he withdrew them al"so, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the souldiers from every ensign one "after another. By this means were the footmen had away without any trouble and tumult, and the "horsemen together with the light armour opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the "main battell before the enemies: neither was the Cavalry called back from their stations where"in they were placed, untill the forefront of the rampier and trench was fully finished. The K. like"wise, who without any refusal of battell had stood ready that day to fight, contenting himself with
 "this, that he knew the day thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies back into his "camp. After the Romans were encamped and well fortified, C. Sulpicius Gallus, a martiall Colonel "of the second legion, who had been Praetor the year before by permission of the Councill called
 "the souldiers to a generall audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night
 "following there would be seen an eclipse of the moon, from the second hour of the night untill
 "the fourth: and this he did, because no man should wonder thereat, as if it were a prodigious to"ken. Also he made demonstration unto them, that it might be well fore-known and fore-told,
 "because it is a thing coming at certain times by the ordinary course of nature. For like as they
 "nothing marvelled at the rising and going down both of sun and moon at set hours, nor to see the "moon sometimes shine bright out at the full, otherwhises in the waining light only with the "small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous matter of it,
 "that the should be dark, when as her body is hidden by the shadow of the earth. Thus the moon
 "was eclipsed at the hour before prognosticated, overmight before the even of the Nones of Septe"mber: by occasion whereof, the Roman souldiers held Gellius for a deeply learned sage, and a di"vine Philosopher: but contrariwise, the Macedonians were troubled with the sight thereof, as an "heavy prodigy, portending and prefiging the ruin of that realm and the utter destruction of the "whole nation. And surely the howling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while,
 "untill the moon recovered her full light again, was a very prognostication and prediction of no
 "less. The morrow after both the armies were so hot and greedy of fight, that both K. and Col.
 "were blamed by some of their own souldiers, for that they went out of the field the day before,
 "and struck not battell. As for the K. he had his excuse and defence ready, not only because the en"emy refused the fight first, in open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his camp, but also
 "in that he had pitch and ranged his ensignes in such a place, unto which the Macedonian battell,
 "called Phalanx, could not advance, considering that with the smallest disadvantage of the ground,
 "there is no use at all thereof. The Col. for his part, as to have given the enemy advantage to depart in "the night-season (if he had to list) so now also he trifled out the time, making semblance of sacri"fice, whereas the signal of battell at the point of day was put forth for the souldiers to enter into "the field. Well at the last, when the sacrifice was duly performed, about the third hour of the day, "he assembled his Councill about him: where, there were that thought he prolonged the "time on set purpose, with his discourses and unseasonable consultations, and spent that opportuni"ty so, which should be employed better in fight and execution of some worthy exploit. Howbeit,
 "after some speeches passed, the Col. made an Oration unto his souldiers in this wise. Pub. Nafica
 "said, he a right valiant young gentleman, of all those that advised to give battell yesterday, was "the only man that uttered his mind, and acquainted me with his counsell: yet afterwards, even
 "he held his peace and kept silence, in such sort, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of "my mind in the end. Some others there be that have taken a ferverall course by themselves, and "thought it better to carp at their General behind his back than to admonish him to his face. As "for me, I will not think much nor make it daime, to render a reason both to you. O. P. Nafica
 "said to me also who have thought the same that you did (although they carried it more secret"ly) why I made such stay and deferred battell. For so far off am I of repenting for our yesterdays
 "repulse, that I am of this belief rather, how by that means and policy, alone I saved the whole ar"my. And because none of you may think that I have taken such a pitch, and hold that opinion "of mine without just cause, let him consider & discourse together with me (if he think it good)
 "what advantages the enemies had, & how many things made against us. First and foremost, how "far they surpass us in pumber, assured I am that none of you, either was ignorant before, or "could chide but observe and mark yesterday, seeing their army how it was thrust and thronged "together. And of that small number which we are, the fourth part of our fighting men was left "behind to guard the carriage, & we yet wot, that we let not the most cowards to the keeping of "our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together. How then? think we, pray you, that

The Oration
of Pub. Nafica unto his army

"we have not enough of it, even out of this very camp wherein we have rested one whole night,
 "to go either this day or to morrow at the fatterest; with the leave and power of the gods into
 "the field, if you shall so think good? Skilleth it not indeed, and is it all one, to bid a souldier "take arms, whom neither the travel of this daies journey, nor toil of laborious work hath "tainted and wearied, but is at quiet, yea and fresh within his tent & so to bring him forth into "the field for a battell lusty and strong, full of bodily vigour of heart? or to offer and expose unto
 "the enemy who is hearty and fresh, who hath taken his rest and ease, & hath brought with him "to a fight, his strength entire and whole, not foiled or spent upon any occasion? to present, I say,
 "unto such an enemy, a souldier tired out with long journey upon the way, wearied with carry"ing his burden, all molten to sweat and dropping therewith, his throat parched for thirst, his "face and eyes full of dust, and all his body roasted against the noon-sun? now tell me, by the "ye ow to the gods, what is he that being in this so good a plight, were he the veriest beast and
 "coward otherwise in a country, could not foil and beat out of the field the hardiest & most val"iant man that is? Moreover, what should I say how materiall & important this also was that our "enemies had marshalled their battalions with great leisure after long time of rest: that they had "repaired and refreshed their own strength, & stood ranged every man orderly in his own rank;
 "whereas we were at one instant both hastily to embattel and let our men in array, yea, and also "to fall to skirmish pell mell without all order? But may some men say, True it is, our battell in"deed we should have had much out of square and shuffled in great confusion: yet our camp was "well fortified; we had forecalt and provided for good watering, the passage thereto was good
 "C & safe by reason of strong guards placed every way: & all coats were cleared about us by our "espials. Nay, I wis, but contrariwise, nothing (to lay truly) was ours, but the bare & naked plain "field where we were to fight. Your ancestors in times past, esteemed a camp fortified with ram-
 "piers and trenches, as good as a port and harbor of safe refuge, for an army against all chances
 "and misfortunes whatsoever: from thence to issue forth, & thither to retire for safety, after they "had been tossed and beaten with the tempest of a battell. And therefore when it was empaled
 "round about with good defences, they had a care also to re-enforce & strengthen it with strong "guards; forasmuch as he that hath lost his camp & is turned out of it, is ever holden for vanqui-
 "shed, notwithstanding he won the day & had the better in the field. The head of a camp serveth
 "for a place of retreat to the conqueror: & offering to the conquered, how many armies could
 "D I reckon, which having sped but badly in the battell, were driven to take their leaguers: yet after"wards seeing their time, and spying their vantage otherwise failed forth & in the turning of "an hand repulsed and discomfited the enemy for all his former victory? This feat and retreat of "souldiers in time of war, seemeth as a man would say, another native country of theirs: the "rampier serveth instead of walls, the tent and pavilion is to every souldier his house and home,
 "And should we have fought indeed like vagabonds without any place of manition wherunto we "might berake our selves after victory? But against these difficulties and emplacements of giving
 "battell, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (say some) had gone his waies last night
 "between: what a foul deal of trouble & sorrow should we have endured again in pursuing him
 "as far as to the heart, nay, to the farthest frontiers of Macedony? But I for my part verily hold this
 "E for certain, that if he had ever meant to have (started from hence, he would never have (said thus
 "here as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more easy was it
 "for him to depart & be gone when we were farther off, than now when we are ready to tread
 "upon his heels, and go over his back? Surely he could not possibly have given us the slip, but we "should have been aware of his dislodging, either by day or night. But, say he had gone his waies,
 "what could we have wished more at the gods hands, than to set upon the back part of the en"emies in the open plain ground, departing in dilatory disband one from another, as they aban"doning their fort and strong hold, and whose camp situate most sure upon an exceeding high and "deep bank of a river fortified also with a rampier, and many a sconce and turret beside, we gave
 "the venture to assault? Lo, what the causes were, why the battell was put off from yesterday to
 "F this present. For I must tell you, I am as willing my self to try the fortune of a field as any other:
 "and to that end (because the adventures to the enemy over the river Enepus were stopped up a"gainst us) I have found a new way through another pass and straight, by disceizing the guards of
 "the enemies there left: and never will I give over until I have defeated him quite, and brought
 "this war to an end. After this oration all kept silence, partly for that many of them were weary of "his opinion: and partly, because they feared to find fault to no purpose & so to give offence, when
 "a thing howsoever once past, cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither was there
 "battell fought, for any great desire that the Consul of King had thereto. The King wished it not;
 "because he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor trou"bled about their embattelling in such sort & hardly at the last brought into order. The Consul a"gain had no great stomach thereto, for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of fe-
 "well nor forage brought in and laid up already: and for the purveyance thereof, out of the villa"ges and fields near at hand, many of the souldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And thus
 "when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chance and fortune (which is more po-
 "werfull than all the counsel and policy of man) made means and gave occasion of a battell. There "was a river not very great, near to the enemies camp, whereto both Romans and Macedonians
 "watered: and on either bank side certain guards kept their stations for the safety and security as well of the one part as the other. Two Cohorts there were for the Romans of Martucines and Pelignians, footmen: two troops or cornets besides of Sampit horsemen: all commanded by M. Sergius Sylva a lieutenant. Over and besides, another standing corps de guard quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely, of Firman, Vetinae, and Cremonian footmen, together with two troops of Placentine and Eslerian horsemen, all conducted by lieutenant Cluvius. Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no side provoked or challenged other: it fortuned that a jumper horie of the Romans about the fourth hour of the day brake from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of such, took the river and made toward the bank of the farther side: & when three souldiers followed after cros the water almost knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the jade from the midle of the river to their bank side: but after one of them was slain, the Romans recovered the beast again & retired to their own guard. Now when was a strong corps de guard of 800 Thracians upon the bank which the enemies kept, from whence some few at first, taking it to the heart that a countmain of theirs should thus be killed before their face, travelled over the river in pursuit of those that had slain him: afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard leadeth to the battel. Men were moved with a reverence of the majesty of his place, as he was L. General: also with respect of the honour and glory of the man otherwise, and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about threecore years old he did undergo the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of greatest travell and danger. That void space which was between the light targettiers, called Currati, and the thick battalions named Phalanges, the legion took up clean, and broke within the battell of the enemies. Behind the Currati was this legion, and had affront them the Pavosiers called Agilspides, with replendent or shining shields, L. Antius, who had been Consul beforetime, was commanded to lead against the battallion of other Pavosiers called Leucaspides with white shields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Against the right flank, from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederat horsemen, and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of men, so some shew in apparence of words when they are first spoken of; but come to practise and try them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothing: even so at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any use and service at all. That violence of the Elephants (such as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediately, and forced the left flank to retire. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midle entered upon the Phalanx and put it to flight: neither was there any caufe of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the first troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards discomfited it. True it is that to abide the force thereof it is impossible, so long as it keepeth close united together: & putteth forth their sharp pointed pikes bent thick couched together breast-high: but if a man by charging the same here and there, force them once to turn about those pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are unwieldy and hard to guide, they soon are intangled and catch one within another untowardly: but in case it fall out so, that there be any tumult made either a flank or behind, then there ensueth a generall trouble and confusion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down: like as it happened then, when as against the Romans, who assailed them by troops in sundry parts, they were driven to break their battallion into many pieces, as it were, and so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans espied where there was a breach made and lane left between, and there they would insinuat and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had run upon the front of the Phalanx close ranged altogether with their whole battallion, they had enwrapped and entangled themselves within their pikes: (which in the beginning of the conflict hapned to the Pelignians, as they unwisely dealt with the targettiers, called Cyrati, and had never been able to sustain that battallion united thick and couched together. But as there was a cruel slaughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place, save only those that slung away their weapons and fled: so the souldiers of the Cavalry departed in manner safe and sound out of the conflict. The K. himself was the first man that fled: & now by this time was escaped beyond Pydna, and with his cornets of horsemen which they call Sacred made haste to Pella. Another followed Cossent, and the Cavalry of the Odyssians: consequently other troops and companies of Macedonian horsemen departed and kept their arrayes broken: for that the Phalanx or battallion of the footmen between which kept the conquerours occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to pursue the men of arms. A long time continued the massacre of this Phalanx a flank & behind. In the end, they who escaped the hands of the enemies & fled without weapons to the sea: some, took the water, and stretching forth their hands to them that were aboard in the ships, most humbly besought them for to save their lives: and when they saw the small pinnaces and cockboats making space on all hands toward them from the ships, they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yea, and some swimm'd forward: but when they saw they were by them of the boats slain in all hostile manner like enemies, as many as could, swam back again to land: where they met with a souldier much fiercer, and worse plagued than before: for the Elephants (driven by their governors to the shore) trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point, that never at any one field, were so many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romans: for 20000 men were

A were there slain, and to the number of 6000 (who fled to Pydna out of the battail) came alive into the enemies hands: 5000 besides were taken prisoners, as they fled scattering and disbanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by far of Pelignians; but a greater number somewhat, were hurt and wounded. And if the battail had begun sooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chase upon their enemies, all their forces had been utterly defeated and deavoured by the sword: but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be so hasty and forward in pursuit: considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the country. Perseus fled to the forest Pieria by the port road way with a great number of horsemen, and his royal train about him. So soon as he was entered the forest where the way divided into Bundry and divers parts, seeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and left destitute of their leader, slip some one way and some another home into their own Cities: certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perseus himself, because they rode a direct and ready way. The K. was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Enthus the Governor thereof, and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him service: but contrary-wile, of all those friends who escaped fate out of the battail and chased by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him notwithstanding they were oftentimes sent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Evanor of Crisis, Nona a Breotian, and Archidamus the Ætolian. Fearing therefore lest they who refused to come unto him, would soon after enterprife some greater matter against him: with those three he fled still toward the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon 300 Cretenians. Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the haste he could to pass over the river Axius before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chase there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous toord.

The Consul being returned into the camp with victory, (because he should not have the fruition of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquieted and troubled about his yonger son, and that was P. Scipio, surnamed also afterwards Africanus, because he raised the City of Carthage: the natural son he was of the Consul Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grand child of Africanus: he was at that time 17 years of age, and (which augmented the sorrow of the father) while he followed in chase the enemies upon the spur, was carried by the press a contrary way, in such sort, as it was late ere he returned: and then the Consul having recovered him again safe and sound, felt the joy of so great a victory, and not before.

When the bruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolis, to beseech and call for her aid, Diadrom the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were 2000 in garriſon) lest in that tumult and garboil they would spoil and rife the City: cratically surnamed a fellow on her purpose in guise and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the mids of the market place: wherein it was written, That the Roman fleet was arrived in Emathia, and that the territories all about were pitifully wasted by them; and therefore the rulers and captains of Emathia requested him to send a garriſon to succour them against these foragers. When he had read these counterfeit letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Emathia for to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loosely fragling and scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a foul havoc and slaughter of them, and besides raise and bring away with them a great booty: with all, he forgot not to elevate almight as he could, the fame of the forsaide unhappy field fought, saying, That if all had been true, there would have been messengers coming thick one after another upon their flight, to bring fresh tidings still thereof. Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians: and so soon as he saw they were passed over the river Stymon, incontinently he shut the gates. The third day after the battail fought, came Perseus to Amphipolis, and from thence he sent Orators to Paulus with an herald of peace. Mean-while Hippias, Midon, and Pantareus the Kings principal friends, went themselves to the Consul, and surrendered unto the Romans Berzbe, whither they had retired and fled immediately out of the field. Other Cities also stricken with fear one after another, prepared to do the like.

The Consul, after he had sent to Rome with tidings and letters of this victory, Q. Fabius his own son, together with L. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, gave the spoil of the enemies army thus lying dejected, unto his footmen: but the horsemen he allowed the booty of all the territory round about, with condition, that they should not be absent from the camp more than two nights. Then he removed nearer unto the sea and lodged about Pydna. Pirri, Berzbe (as is before said) yielded then. But the Pydnians who were next unto him, as yet were behind with sending their Embassadors: the reason was, for that the confused confluence thither of many nations, and the disordered multitude of those that fled out of the field, and were all met together, hindered the counsel and consent of the whole City: so as the gates were not only shut but also mured up. Now were Midon and Pantareus sent to parle under the walls with Solon, who lay there with a garriſon by whose means the whole troop and multitude of armed men was sent away, the City rendered up and the pillage given to the souldiers.

Perseus, whose only hope was in the aid of the Bithians whom he had assailed and solicited, and for which purpose he had sent his Embassadors (although in vain) held a publick assembly, and bringing his son Philip with him, came forth before the people; to the end that he might by some exhortation confirm and strengthen the hearts, as well of the Amphipolitans as the companies of foot and horse, who either at all times continually had followed him, or were retired thither by flight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a speech unto the audience (which he oft began to do) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himself was not able to speak, he came down from the pulpit, and imparted unto Eucander the Cretensian those points, which his will was to be delivered and propoged unto the congregation there assembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept again to see the King so piteously shed tears; so they regarded not the speech of Eucander: nay, some of them were so bold as to cry out aloud from the midst of the assembly, Away, away, and get ye gone from hence that the final remnant of us here perish not for your sakes. The rest resolution of these men stopped Eucander's mouth, that he could not say a word and reply again. The King by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveyed into certain bottoms upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and silver, went also in person down to the water side. The Thracians durst not go aboard and commit to sea, but slunk every man away to his own home; and so did all the sort of soldiers besides. The Cretensians only (for greedy hope of gain) accompanied the King, who because in sharing & dealing money among them, he should incur more offence than win thanks, laid out fifty talents among them upon the river side to scramble for. When they had made quick riddance and a clean hand with it, they went aboard in a great hurry so as one barge overcharged with a multitude of passengers was cast away and sunk in the mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galphes, and the morrow after at Samothrace, the very place that they intended; and thither (by report) were conveyed 3000 talents. Paulus after he had sent presidents to govern every City surrendred, to the end that no injury should be offered in this new peace to the conquered, and detaining with him still the Kings heralds and Orators, not knowing any thing of the Kings flight and departure, sent P. Nasica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horse, to ruinat and destroy at once Sintica, and also to inspect all the designments and enterprises of the Romans.

In this time Melbaea was forced and ransacked by Cn. Octavius; but at Aeginium (to the siege whereof Cn. Anicius the Lieutenant was sent) 300 men were lost by a sally made out of the town, for that the Aeginians heard not the news of the late defeat.

The Consul departed from Padua with his whole army, and the morrow after came before Pella. Where having encamped within a mile of the City, he made abode there for certain daies to view on all sides the situation of the City, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been chosen not without good cause, for the imperial seat of the Macedonian Kings. Situat it is upon an hill that lieth to the Southwest enclosed round with meers so deep as they cannot possibly be waded and passed though; and these marshes are bred and fed both winter and summer by waters overflowing out of certain lakes. Within the very marsh next unto the City side, there standeth a strong Tower, by it self, bearing up above the rest, as it were an Island raised upon a terrace made with exceeding labor of mans hand, which terrace both sustineth a wall, and is not hurt with the moisture of the marsh round about it, and a far off seemeth close joined to the City wall. Howbeit, divided it is by a river between it and the wall, and yet united to the City by a bridge over it: so as, whosoever assaileth the same without, can have no access any way to it neither, if the King be disposed to shut and enclose any man within, can he possibly make an escape and get forth but over the said bridge; which a few men may keep and guard with ease. In this place the Kings treasure used to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were sent to King Gentius first, and afterward slaid and detained. During the time that the Consul remained about Pella, in his standing camp many embassages had audience given them who repaired thither out of Theffaly, especially to congratulate with him, testifying their own joy and wishing his. But the Consul after that he had intelligence that Perseus had crossed over to Samothracia, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made, came to Amphipolis. The whole multitude went forth of the City in great numbers to meet him, which gave testimony to every man, that neither a good nor just King

Perseus was taken prisoner by Emilius Paulus in Samothracia. When Antiochus King of Syria besieged Ptolomæus and Cleopatra, King and Queen of Egypt, Embassadors were sent from the Senat of Rome, willing Antiochus to give over, and beseege no more an associat King unto them: but when

A when he made answer to this their message delivered, that he would consider better what he had to do, Popilius one of the said Embassadors, with his rod that he had in his hand drew a circle about the King, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle: by which understanding, and blunt behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away arms and surcease war. Divers Embassadors of States and Kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senat. As for that of the Rhodians because the late war they stood out making part against the Romans, it was excluded. The morrow after when it was debated in counsel about making war upon the Rhodians, the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their country in the Senat: So, they neither had a friendly dispatch had forward, as allied associates, nor yet were sent away as professed enemies. Macedony was now reduced into the form of a Province. Emilius Paulus triumphed, notwithstanding the contradiction of his own soldiers, discontented for that they were pinched & cut short in the pillage; & although Ser. Sulpicius Galba interposed himself & gain said it. He led before his chariot Perseus with him three sons. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not be entire and accomplished, himself fully it was with the death of his two sons: the one died before, the other after the triumph of his father. The Consuls took a review of the City, in which were affected and enrolled in their subsidy books 312805 citizens. Prusias King of Bithynia repaired to Rome, to rejoice with the Senat in their behalf for the victory and conquest of Macedony, where her commended unto the Senat his son Nicomedes. This bewinded King, made all of flattery, named himself the enfranchised vassal of the people of Rome.

Quintus Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victory, albeit they made all the hast that possibly they could, and came speedily to Rome, yet found the joy thereof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battail fought with the Kings, even as the playes and games were exhibited in the shew-place, there was heard suddenly at first, a confused humming noise, which spread over all the companies of the spectators. That a field was fought in Macedony and Perseus vanquished: afterwards arose a more clear and evident voice, which grew at length to an open shout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the said victory. The magistrates wondered hereat, and made search after the author of this so sudden gladness, but none would be found: and then verily it passed away as the momentary joy of some vain and uncertain occurrence: howbeit a joyful preface of some good luck settled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming, all men rejoiced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victory it self. This joyous conceit of this assembly in the shew-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no less probability and likelihood of truth, in this manner: Upon the * 22 of September (which was the second day of the solemnity of Romans games) as the Consul was going up to the lifts for to set out the running of the chariots, a post, by report, (who said he was come out of Macedony) presented letters unto him decked with laurel. The Consul then, so soon as he had set on foot the race, presently mounted up into his own chariot: and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, he shewed unto the people the said laureat letters: which being once seen, the people presently (forgetting all their sports and fights) ran out into the mids of the cirque & thither the Consul assembled the Senat: unto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and allowance of the LL. even before the publick stages and scaffolds, he published the contents thereof to all the people in this manner, That L. Emilius his colleague had fought a set field with K. Perseus. That the army of the Macedonians was discomfited and put to flight. That the King himself was fled with some few of his train, and that all the Cities of Macedony were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applause, in so much as many men there, left the sight of these disports, and carried their joyful news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battail given in Macedony. The morrow after the Senat assembled in Curia (H. Silius) and ordained it was that publick processions should be solemnized: an Act also passed, that the Consul Emilius should dismiss all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only the sea-fouldiers and mariners: and as for the discharging of those soldiers, agreed it was, that it should be moved in the Council-chamber, when the Lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Emilius the Consul, for they had dispatched a courier with letters before them. Now these messengers afore said entered the City the * 25th of September about the second hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who encountering them upon the way wherefoever they went, accompanied them to Rome, and so directly went to the market-place and tribunal seat. In returned that the Senators sat then in the ordinary Curia or Council-house, and thither the Consul brought the Embassadors. Where they were received and held so long only as they might declare these points. How great the Kings forces were, as well in foot as horse: how many thousand were slain, how many taken prisoners: what small loss of Roman soldiers that great defeat of enemies cost: how few they were in number that the King fled with: that it was supposed he would pass into Samothracia: that the fleet was in readiness to make way after them in chase; and that it was not possible for him to escape either by Land or Sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the general assembly of the people, where, they made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the Consul. That all the sacred temples and churches should be set open; and that every man should depart out of the assembly to render thanks unto the Gods in such sort, that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were replenished with mighty multitudes and congregations nor of men only, but also of women. Then the Senat met again in the ordinary Curia: and ordained that publick processions and thanks should be made for five daies together in all Churches and Chappels and at every Altar for the happy and fortunat successe of L. Emilius, and that great head of beasts should be killed for sacrifice. Also that the ships which did ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tyber for to be sent into Macedony (in case it had so fallen out, that the King had been able to have resisted) should be retired and drawn to land, and so laid up drie in their docks and arsenals: also that the mariners should be cessed, after the receipt of a whole years pay, and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Consul, should have their conge and passport to be gone. Item, that all the souldiers in Corepra, Brundisium, about the Adriatick sea, or in the territory of the Larinats (for in all these there was an army let in readinesse, when C. Licinius if need required should have incurred his colleague) should have their discharge. Also processions were published in the full assembly of the people, to begin * from the tenth day of October, and so to hold on five daies after.

Out of Illyriam also two Lieutenants or messengers, to wit, L. Licinius Novus and P. Decius, brought word that the army of the Illyrians was defeated: that King Gentius was taken prisoner, & that all Illyriam was reduced under the obedience of the people of Rome. For which exploits achieved by the leading and conduct of L. Aemilius the Pretor, the Senat decreed a solemn procession K to be holden for three daies, like as also the Latine feast & holy-daies were proclaimed by the Consul, for to be holden the * ninth, tenth, and eleventh daies of November. Some have recorded that the Rhodian Embassadors had not yet their dispatch, nor were sent away, but after the news of this victory, were called into the Senat in mockery and scorn of that fortif. insolence and pride of their own. And then Aegolis the principal person of them spake in this manner, * That the Rhodians had sent them in deed as Embassadors to treat about an accord & to make peace between the Romans and King Perseus, for that this war as it was grievous and prejudicial to all Greece, so it could not chuse but be chargeable and hurtful to the Romans themselves. But since out it is passing well through the goodness of fortune, that the war is ended otherwise: and hath given them to good an occasion and opportunity, to rejoyce and testify their joy in the behalf of the Romans, for the achievement of so brave and notable a victory. Thus much spake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made answer again, * That the Rhodians had sent that embassy notwithstanding the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenses defraied by the Romans, but only in love and favor of King Perseus. For if they had been respective unto them (as they would make semblance and have the world to think) they should have addressed their Embassadors when as Perseus invaded Thessaly with an army, & for two years space persecuted and plagued the cities of Greece, besieging some, & frightening others with menaces of warrey: all that while, not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the Romans were mounted over the streights and passed through into Macedony: that King Perseus an embassage for no other reason in the world, but to rid and deliver Perseus out of that imminent danger which threatened him so neer hand. With which answer the Embass. were sent away.

About the very same time M. Marcellus being departed out of his government in the province of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcolica a renowned and famous City in those parts, brought home with him and bestowed in the publick treasury ten pound weight of gold; and * a million of sesterces in silver coin.

Paulus Emilius the Consul lying encamped (as is aforesaid) neer Syrus in the Odomantidian territory, when he saw the letters from King Perseus brought unto him by three Embassadors of base condition, wept (by report) himself to consider the fatality of this world, and the fickleness of mans life: to wit (I say) that he who elsewhere could not rest content with the royalty of Macedony, but would needs was upon the Dardaniams and Illyrians and levy the aid of the Bastarnians. N now after the loss of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a small land, where, like a poor suppliant he remained in secrecy, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious protection of a sanctuary & privileged place. But when he read the inscription of the letter with this title, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, greeting, he could no more pry him, for thinking of his blockish folly, in that he had no sense and feeling of the calamity and misery wherein he stood. And therefore albeit the contents of the letter otherwise were prayers to demits and abject as little favoured of a princely mind, yet was that embassage dismissed without answer and without letters. Perseus soon perceived what title it was that he must lay down and forget now that he was vanquished: whereupon he addressed other letters in quality of a privat person without any other addition at all: and by those as he craved, so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be sent unto him, with whom he might parley and commune as touching the state and condition of his present fortune. So three delegat Embassadors were sent unto him, namely, P. Lentulus, A. Posthumus Albinus, and A. Antonius. But nothing was effected in this agency or embassage: whilst Perseus stuck hard and laboured all he could to hold still and keep the royal name of King, and Paulus endeavoured contrary-wisely, that he should submit himself and all that he had to

A to the protection and clemency of the people of Rome. During their debates and affaires between them, the fleet of Cn. Octavius was arrived at Samothracia, who also presenting before their eyes fearful objects of error, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair intreaty and good usage to yield and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an accident, either hapning by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans device of set purpose. L. Attilius a noble young Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a general assembly, requested of the Magistrates that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wise; * My masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a false tale or a true tale which we have heard, That this is a sacred land, and the soil thereof holy and altogether inviolable? When they all accorded in one consent, that the land was as holy and sacred as it was reported: How is it then (qd. he) that a murderer hath violated and polluted it with the blood of King Eumenes? And considering that in all preambles and prelates of sacred and divine service, and innocent hands will you suffer to deede your most secret sanctuaries and devout tabernacles to be stained with the bloody body of a thief and felon? Now was it a ripe report and common bruit in every City of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been murdered at Delphos by Evander, the Samothracians, besides that they saw their whole land and the said Temple to be in the power and puissance of the Romans, took their reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they sent Theonidas, the sovereign magistrate (whom they call their King, unto King Perseus, giving him to understand, * That Evander the Cretensian (whom they call with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and ended for entering within the liberties and sacred precincts of the Temple, with unclean and impure hands. Now if Evander stand upon his innocency, and knoweth himself cleer and unguilty of the capital crime laid to his charge, let him come to his answer and plead his cause for his own defence, and he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judicial trial of the issue, retire he and depart, that he pollute not the temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Perseus called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to try the process of justice: neither would his cause justify him, nor any favour bear him out. He much feared withal, lest being cast and condemned, he would bewray Perseus himself and appeach him for the fether and author of that so horrible a fact: and no way then but one, even with patience and resolution to take his death. Evander gained nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poison than upon the sword's point, fought so, yet meant to flee and be gone. The King upon advertisement hereof, fearing lest the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evasion to avoid due punishment, commanded Evander to be made away and killed. After which murder committed thus rashly without all advisement, he thought himself, & considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, so Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained and polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul fact of his, was by the corruption of Theonidas quite averred another way: and he for a sum of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his own hangman. But Perseus by this lewd and deceitable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, (so well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betrayed for his labour by him, unto whom he refused to be a traitor) estranged clean the hearts and affections of all men from him: so as now every man ranged with the Romans. Thus abandoned as he was and left to himself, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Orander the Cretensian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace (because he had negotiated and traded in those parts;) and with him he dealt to embark him in some small foil, and so to conduct him into Coty. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Thrace, wherein in a pinnace stood in readinesse: thither, after sun-setting were all things brought for necessary uses and money withal, as much as closely could be conveyed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back dore of the house, into a garden neer his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambered over a mud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Orander already loosed from the foresaid creek, for so soon as the money was once brought thither into the vessel, he lanced into the deep and let his course for Candy. Perseus, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandered a good while along the strand; and fearing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple cloie unto a blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians they called thole the Kings pages who were the Princes and noble mens sons, chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the King. That company yet followed after the King in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him, until such time as by the commandment of Cn. Octavius, the publick cryer pronounced with a loud voice, That the Kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothracia, if they would turn to the Romans, should enjoy with safety of life their estate entire, their liberty free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedony. At which proclamation once published, they all immediately revolted to the Romans, and entered their names with C. Postumius, a martial colonel. Likewise Ion of Thessalonica, delivered into the hands of Ottavio the young infants of the King, and not one of them was left with Perseus, but Philip his eldest son: and then he yielded both himself and that son into the hands of Ottavio, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whose Temple they were, for that he received no aid and succour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: and thither also was brought aboard all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Ottavio sent the King to the camp unto the consul, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Paulus, replying this for a second victory, (as it was no less indeed to be esteemed) presently upon the receipt of the message, killed beasts for sacrifice: and when he had called his counsel about him, and read the letters of the Pretor before them, he sent Q. Aelius Tubero to meet the King upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there seen before, so great a multitude to run out for to see any solemn fight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syrax was taken prisoner and brought into the Roman camp: who besides that there was no comparison between him and Perseus, either in regard of his own name or the renown of his nation, was then also but an accessory as it were to the Punick war, like as Gentius now to the Macedonian. Perseus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfather only (whom he neerly succeeded in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent glory of Philip and Alexander the Great, who brought the sovereign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perseus entered the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his misery, might cause more compassion to be had of him. The assistance of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the very press he could not march forward, until such time as the consul sent his sergeants and his officers to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the consul his pavillion. The consul arose, and (giving commandment to the rest to sit still) advanced forward a little, and caught out his hand to the King as he entered into the pavillion: and when he bowed and debased himself to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to sit down right over-against those whom he called thither to counsel. The first question that he demanded of him was this: "What wrong he had sustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he should be constrained to enterprise and begin the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and so to hazard himself his whole state and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he staid a good while without utterance of one word: calling his eyes weilly upon the ground, and shedding tears withal. "Then spake the consul again: If you had been but a young (qd. he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvel the less, that you should be so ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome: either for a friend or an enemy: but now, since you both had your hand in that war which your father waged against us and also could not chide but remember the peace afterwards made with him, and which we observed most faithfully. What policy was it for you to entertain war rather than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had found in peace? When as he would yet make no answer at all either to question or accusation, the consul went on and said: "Well, howsoever these things are thus fall out and come to pass, be it through the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the destinies, be of good cheer yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of the people of Rome, well known and proved in the misfortune of many Princes and States, afford you not only hope, but certain assurance of safety. Thus much spake he to Perseus in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own assistants and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. "A notable example and rare mirror you see (qd. he) of the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are steele and youthful gallants in the heat of your young blood. And therefore let no man in time of his prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon the pretence of fate wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of this flattering and flattering world is able to lift aloft, nor yet the blustering blasts of frowning fortune can cast down or dash upon the rocks. After the consul was risen and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Aelius. But for that day Perseus was not only invited courteously to sup with the consul, but respected also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garrisons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities near adjoining entertained the rest. This was the end of the war between Perseus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perseus was counted the twentieth King after Careanus, who was the first that reigned there. This Perseus began his reign that year wherein Q. Fulvius and

A and L. Manlius were Consuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Consuls of Rome, the Senate entialed and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his reign continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and base, until the daies of Philip the son of it was within the compass and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyria. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the reign of Alexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinite dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Armenia and India, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red sea. At that time was the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and sundry Kingdoms. And disunited and rent the whole: & so from the highest top & pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fifty years. When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Athens, Antiochus who C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and wait those ships which were bound for Macedony after of their rode, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, and the enemies vessels removed out of Egypt, to accomplish that embassy which he had taken in hand: to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Laryssa (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and situate just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory flown so far) requesting him to set sail thither and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and so to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to sail a little farther, and spend some small time for to gratify and benefit a city associat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the same principal citizens afore said urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general assembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made rehearsal there in open audience, of all which had been done or spoken (sounding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general vated all that the spake, with his four visage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar: insomuch as they might well conjecture and guess, how the whole body of the Senate stood affected unto their ill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimius was more temperate, who laid, that the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius, was not to those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were decrees full of flattery to repent of. All which practices of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty in case the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great assent and applause: not more for elevating the fault and trespass of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chief men among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and save in some sort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so well taken, as their speech who accorded to Decimius, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Whereupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perseus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassadors or delegates having so journeyed no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made sail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no less gentle carriage of Decimius was the very cause that they perished resolute, and gave not over until they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

While these affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had assailed in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Egypt besides, reconquer the Kingdom, to the end that soon after the conquest obtained, he might let upon him likewise withdrew his army away into Syria. Plotomachus for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making full account, that while he kept his younger brother affrighted with the fear of siege by the help of his sister he might be received into Alexandria: considering withal, that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first he sent unto his sister, after-afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and send, before he had concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him to suspect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the rest of Egypt unto him, he left yet a strong garison behind at Pelusium: and well he knew, that he held still the frontier Towns as the very keies of Egypt, to the end that he might with the issue of the civil and domestical war between brethren, that this he conceived of it, that this would be the issue of the civil and domestical war between brethren. That the victor wearied with war, should not be able to make head against Antiochus, these things wisely foresaie and seen by the elder brother, were received with assents of the younger and those that were assitant about him: and the sister between Rood in very good stead, not by her good advice and counsel only, but also by her effectual prayers. And therefore by a general accord of all, peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolemæus received into Alexandria, without any gain: I say, or resistance at all so much as of the very multitude: notwithstanding that during the war they were much decayed and weakened (not only by the siege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment and rejoiced much from this, in case he had brought his forces into Egypt for to restore Ptolemæus into his own estate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Asia and Greece, when he received their embassages, or sent forth his letters into all parts) so it fell out, that he was so highly offended and displeased hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus: himself in person at the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt, marched forward with his army as far as into the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt, encountered him in his journey about * Rhinocollura, Coelo-Syria. The Embassadors of Ptolemæus met him in his journey about * Rhinocollura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their King, and offered, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requesting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deal by sword in hand and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his life as well the whole life of Cyprus, as the City * Pelusium, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called * Pelusiæcum Offium. And therewith he set him down a day, before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said condition. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they failed in the mouth of Nilus near Pelusium, the states along the deserts of Arabia yielded. Then, being received of them that inhabit about Memphis, and the rest of the Egyptians, partly with favor and good will and partly for fear and constraint: by small journeys he descended toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leusina (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and salutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius; but he delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that; ther hecried. After he had read the writing through, he answered that he would devote with his friends and consider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manners of speech which he had by nature, made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his hand, and withal, "Make me an answer (qd, he) I advise you such as I may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King stood at this so rude and violent a commandment, after he had said and paused a while: i will be content (qd, he) to do whatsoever the Senat shall ordain. Then and not before. Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the said Embassadors having by their authority established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not thoroughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Egyptian ships. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the inheritance of the Kingdom restored again to the race of Ptolemæi.

Of the two Conflicts that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, fo the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be employed in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entred into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therein, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voyage for France he kept his standing leaguer for the summer time about the mountains Scimmina and Papius; near the places called Maacri. And afterwards he winned about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For, the Roman legions, because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Rendevous, remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Pappi. Carbo, upon whose lot Sardinia was falln, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civil jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and forrainers. Popilius likewise, that embassage which was sent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controversies between the two Kings were decided. & the army of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria. After this, came the Embass, also of the Kings themselves. Those of Antiochus made report that the King their

A matter esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory whatsoever: and obaieth the orders let down by the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the Gods: and finally they testified their own contentment, and wished them great joy of their victory obtained, saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the achieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service. The Embassadors of Ptolemus in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra, rendered thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senat and people of Rome, than to their own parents, yea, & more than to the immortal Godsdior by their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers Kingdom, which was by them at the point to have loft forever. The Senat returned this answer again, that whereas Antiochus had been ruled by the Embassadors, therein he did well: and as it befell him, and in so doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. Again, if Ptolemus and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Egypt, had found any goodnes, and commodity by them, the Senat was very glad thereto and rejoiced thereat and would endeavour and work it so, that they might be persuaded that the greatest affurance and safeguard of their realm rest at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor C. Papprius had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these Embassadors according to the ancient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedony to redouble the joy of the victory, importing that Perseus was fure enough in the hands of the Consul,

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was between the Embassadors of the Pifans and Lunetians. They of Pifa complained that they were de-
 C lized & driven out of their territory by the Roman coloners; contrarywise thole of Lunaphilia averred, that the Land in controversy had been set out and assigned for them by the Triumvirs.
 The Senat hereupon sent fifteen as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the said territory and to determine accordingly; and thole were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blafio, T. Sempronius Mafcia, L. Nævius Balbus, and C. Apulnius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemn em-bassage sent in common from Eumenes, Attalus, and Archeus all three brethren, to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Romans victory. Moreover, L. Maunius the treasurer
 D was ready at Puteoli to receive and welcome Mafjaba the son of K. Mafjufius, as he floud disbarik and set on land: for sent he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediately audience was given him in the Senat. As This young Prince spake in such fort, as the things which of " themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by " his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot and horie both, how many Elephants, what " quantity of corn for that four years pace (during the war) his father had sent over into Alex-
 " dony, but two things there were for which he was dismained and could not chuse but bluih: the " one that the Senat by their Embaff, had made request unto him, and not commanded rather to " furnish them with necessities for the war: the other, that they had sent them money to pay for " their corn. For Mafjufius was not forgetful, but bare well in mind, that he held his Kingdom as " first conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the peo-
 E ple of Rome: and for his own part, he could content himself with the ufe and occupation thereof,
 " as a tenant in fee-farm; acknowledging the propriety and poffeffion thereof to be in them who
 " as Lords of the fee feoffed him therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also " should be bold with their own, to take and not to ask, to have and not to crave, much less then
 " to buy the commodities & fruits ifluing out of the lands by them demised, given & granted. As " for Mafjufius sufficed he was, and evermore would rest contented with that overplus whi, the " people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (qd. he) had in charge and commif-
 " fion from his fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards
 " certain foreign riders post overtook me, to let me understand that Maccedony was subdued, and
 " to charge me, that after I had fignified our joy in your behalf, I should fiew unto the Senat, that F my father took such contentment therein, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice
 " and render thanks to Jup. opt. Max. in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senat, " so it might stand with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this " answer from the Senat that his father Mafjufius did as befeemed a good man and thankful per" fon, fo, to do, in giving fuch a grace and honor over & above, to benefit of duty required. More" over, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the " Punick war by his valiant and loial service, as well as he obtained his Kingdom through the fa" vour of the people of Rome; yea, and afterwards according to equity and justice, had born himself
 " right worthily in all sorts of devours and duties during the wars of three Kings one after ano" ther. Neither was it any marvel at all that he rejoiced at the victory of the people of Rome, be" caufe King, who had engaged, hazarded, and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole estate
 " of his Kingdom with the Roman affairs. As for rendering thanks to the Gods for the victory
 " of the people of Rome, let him do that himself in his own house at home; for it should suffice, that " his fon for him performed that duty at Rome. That he and his father both had sufficiently for-" their parts rectified their joy. As for Mafjufius in proper person to leave his realm and depart out
 " of Africk, over and besides that it was in no wise profitable to himself, the Senat deemed it
 " not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Mafjaba in ther more requested, hopes, and let him a longing, feeding him with these and such like conceits, That in Rome this was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend fast and sure to the Romans; the other an ally, sound and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Perseus; and therefore hard it were to let down and say, Whether of the twain would be more easily obtained at the Senate's hands, namely, a suit made in his own name for his preferment, or a demand of some hard course against his brother: so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus, and to deny every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the sequel and proof shewed) was pliant to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promitch, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Siratus a Physician, sent by Eumenes (who relied not secure of his brothers loyalty to Rome, I of purpose for to lie in espial and observe all that Attalus did and to advise him faithfully if he saw him tread awry and practise ought against his duty and allegiance. When he came into him, he found his ears already possessed, and his spirit tempted and solicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and stuck to it close, until he had set all up again which was at the point to run on end and fall to the ground. He alleged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty some by one means, some by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no strength of ancient foundations, it stood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren: in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attalus (qd. he) who are the eldest brother save one, who is it that repute you for less than a King, not only for that he seeth you so mighty at this present, but also the next heir apparent, and without all doubt like shortly to reign indeed? considering the feeble body and craly age of Eumenes, who hath besides no issue of children to succeed him in the royal throne? (for as yet he took no knowledge of him that reigned afterwards.) What need then is there to use violence, and to force that which of its own accord will shortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempest and storm is risen of French wars, threatening peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you Princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord. But if to fortify a war abroad, there should arise a domesticall and civil dissension between you at home, what remedy then but utter ruin and destruction? Neither shall you (Attalus) purchase any good but this, first to prevent that your brother be not King, and then to dilate and disappoint your self of that near and assured hope you have to be K. But say, that to preserve a Kingdom for a brother, and to wrest a Kingdom from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the one and the other: yet surely of the twain, to have saved a Kingdom deserveth greater commendation and praise, in that it sorteth so well with piety and kindness. And certainly, seeing the one is a curied and detestable part even next neighbor to parricide; what scruple and doubt remaineth now which needeth any farther deliberation? For tell me, I beseech you, is it one parcel of the Kingdom that you reach at, or shoot you at the whole? If you aim at a part only, then upon the dismembred and distraction of your puissance, you shall be both twain much weakened and exposed to the danger of all injuries: if you would have all, what shall become of your brother? Would you wish him being your elder, to live a privat person? or so far step in years as he is, a banished man; and namely, with those infirmities of body which he carrieth about him? or would you command to take his life away and rid him out of this world at once? Now truly to say nothing of the unhappy and miserable issue of such graceless and wicked brethren delivered unto us in fained fables, you see what a goodly fair end Perseus is come unto, who being of the Temple of Samothracia, was constrained lying prostrate upon the ground to prostrate himself at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came unjustly by, even with the unnatural murder of his own brother: as if the Gods in heaven had been there present, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in no friendly love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Eumenes, have put these designs into your head, and prick you on to execute the same: even they, I say, will praise your kindness, your piety and constancy, in case you persevere true and trusty to your brother, to the very end. These and such like important persuasions prevailed with Attalus and settled deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senat, after he had wished joy unto them, and protested his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own demerits and good service in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and last of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to send their Embassadors unto them, by whose countenance and authority they might be reclaimed, and so lay arms aside. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in general of the realm; he made a special suit for himself, and demanded to have Eumenes and Antiochus given unto him. And thus, when he had put them besides their hope, who thought verily, that after he had accused his brother he would have required the kingdom to be divided pecuniarily & dismembred, he departed out of the Council house. Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatsoever, King or subject, to have had the like audience with so great favour and applause of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & presents of all sorts whiltes he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among

A Among many Embassies of Africa and Greece, the Rhodian Embassadors were most marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whereas at first they were all trim and goodly to be seen in their white and bright apparel, as decent it was for them that would seem to congratulate for the victory (for if they had worn black or been poorly arrayed, it might have been construed that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Perseus) after that M. Junius the Consul broke with the LL. of the Senat (and all that while the said Embassadors stood without in the common place Comitium) to confer and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents, and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to observe no rights nor customs of hospitality with them. Then went the Consul out of the Senat: unto whom when the Rhodians said that they were come to rejoyce in their behalf for the late victory, and wished to answer in the name of their City to certain crimes wherewith they were charged, requesting that they might speak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Consul pronounced aloud unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romans was to entertain their allies and friends graciously, and among other matters of courtesy and hospitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat: but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such sort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and associates. At the hearing of these words they cast themselves all prostrate on the ground, beseeching the Consul and all those that were present, not to suffer that false imputations of late furnished should against a Nation prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good defects of old (whereof themselves were so full witnesses) stand them in stead. And presently after they had put on ample apparel, and mourning weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City, humbly beseeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Junius the Pretor of L. chief justice for the pleas between citizens and strangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promiged and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; also, that out of the Magistrats for that year they would make choice of some one to be sent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was crossed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the common. Over and besides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and strange talisman, and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Consuls acquainted hereunto, and that in this manner and form. Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in question of war, the Senate did the way first taken, and then the thing was propounded unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the common for their part did more than they might, and athing not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a custom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should intrepose his negative to cross a ye bill, before that privat men in particular had their course and turn granted. both to perwade or diswade the same: by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never protested nor meant to oppose themselves, being moved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to diswade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and dash all: yea, and contrarywise such as came of purpose to cross and nip the same being constrained by the authority and born down by the important arguments alleged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and surcease. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns strove much who should do every thing more unreasonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and flouted the holiness of the Pretor, interposing their negative before the time, and delaying the matter until the coming of the L. General.

Whether we have transgressed and offended yea, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but sure we are of this, that we suffer all punishments and shameful ignominies already that can be desired. Hereof, when the Carthaginians were vanquished, when Philip when Antiochus was overthrowen we came to Rome: from our publick lodging provided for us at the charges of the City we were contented our selves (my LL.) into your Council house, to tell you our great contentment for your conquests: from the Council house we went directly to the capitol, carrying with us presents and oblations to the honor of your gods, but now we the same Rhodians are come unto your Senat clothed in this poor habit and array, as you see, from out of a bare hollery and common inn, where hardly we could have lodging for our money: being commarced in manner of enemies to make our abode without the City walls: we Rhodians (I say) whom but lately ye scoffed with the grant of two Provinces, Asia and Caria, and whom ye graced with a kind of honors, and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards, You ordain as we hear say that the Macedonians and Illyrians should live free, notwithstanding they were in servitude before they lived war against you. Neither look we this in envy & repine for any mans welfare and good estate: we may we acknowledge therein the rare clemency of the people of Rome: and will yet then make the Rhodians of friends, enemies, who during this war did no more but sit and meddle with neither part? Now surely ye Romans are the men that pretend and give out ordinarily, that you have good success and speed well, because they be just and righteous: neither do you glory so much in the event and issue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and conquerors, as for the beginning and first enterprizes, in that ye undertake them not without good cause. The beseeching of Messana in Sicily by the Carthaginians, was the cause that the people of Rome repaired there.

O o o o

"enemies. The assailing of Athenis by Philip, his intent and purpose to bring Greece into servitude, H
 "his relieving of Antiochus with men and money, caused him likewise to be holden for their ene"my. Thus Antiochus brought upon his own head the Roman war, for that he being solicited
 "by the Ætolians your enemies came willingly out of Asia, and with a fleet sailed over to Greece:
 "and when he had seized upon Demetrius, Chalcis, and the streights of Thermopylae, went about
 "to disposseise you of the empire. And last of all, Perseus by levying arms against your allies, by "killing some of their petty kings and princes, by murdering other chief persons of sundry nati"ons and cities, gave you full occasion to make war upon him. But what colourable cause can
 "there be pretended of our calamity, if needs we must miscreant and perish? All this while I "make no difference between our cities safe and that of Polyaratus and Dion our citizens, even "those persons whom we have brought to deliver into your hand. For suppose that the cause
 "were all one, and that we Rhodiens were all faulty and culpable alike, what might that crime be "for which we are touched in this war? We favoured Perseus and that side (you will say) and "like as in the war of Antiochus and Philip, we stood with you against those kings, so now we "took part with the Kings, against you. Was that all? Well, in what sort we are wont to aid our asso"ciates, and how lustily to enterprize wars, do but ask of C. Livius and L. Emilius Regillus, the "Admirals of your fleets in Asia. Your ships never fought at sea without us yet with our Ar-
 "madore alone fought a battail once before Samus, and a second time in Pamphylia against General
 "Antiochus (whose victory there achieved was unto us by so much more honorable and glorious,
 "for that after we had in an unfortunat fight near Samus lost many of our ships & the very choise
 "and flower of our youth, we nothing terrified and dismayed with so great an overthrow, durst turn
 "again to make head, yea, and were so hardy as to encounter the Kings royal navy coming out of "Smyra. And all this have I related not by way of boast & to glorify our selves (for we are not now
 "in case to stand upon those terms) but to give you a taste by the way and put you in mind in what "manner the Rhodiens have need evermore to succour their confederates. And for the better proof
 "thereof, after the defeat of Philip and Antiochus we received at your hands right great rewards
 "& recompence for our service. In case the fortune of Perseus had been so happy as yours is at this "present (praised be the Gods for their grace and goodness & thanked be your own valour withal)
 "and we had come into Macedony to the King upon his victory to require & demand rewards,
 "what could we allege therefor? Might we say that he had bin maintained by our money, or tel-
 "led with our corn: with land forces, or strength at sea? Was there any place by us kept and held
 "with a garrison for his use? were we able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his
 "Captains or upon our own leading and direction? If haply he should demand in what quarters
 "our soldiers kept? in what coast our ships lay inguard for his defence, what could we answer?
 "Peradventure we might plead our cause & excuse our selves in the presence of him, supposed con"queror, like as we now do before you here in place. For by sending our Embassadors to and fro
 "unto you as well as to him about a treaty of peace, this is all the good we have got, that in stead
 "of winning the love & favor of both parts, we incur the heavy displeasure of the one; being thus "charged with crimes and wrapped in dangers. And yet my good LL. and honorable Senators of "Rome, Perseus might truly object that to us, which you in no wise can, namely, that we in the be"ginning of the war sent Embassadors to you making promise in our name of whatsoever was "needful thereunto: also that we would be ready at all assaies to furnish you with ships strongly "rigged and with our youth well appointed, like as in the wars aforesaid. That we performed not "these promises of ours, you only were the let and hindrance, who (whatsoever the cause was) "refused our offered service & rejected all our succours. Well then, neither have we attempted ought
 "as enemies, nor failed in the duty of good friends and allies: but impeached have we been by
 "you for effecting that which we intended. How now? may some man say: Hath there been no"thing done or said in your City (O ye Rhodiens) that you with unfaid or undone, & whereat
 "the people of Rome may justly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Undertake to "justly and make good whatsoever hath been done, I will not, neither have I so little wit I tro:
 "but never I will the publick cause of the whole state, from the privat offences committed by par"ticular persons: for no City is there under the sun, but may otherwhiles have lewd and naughty "Citizens some or other, and evermore a rude and fottish multitude. I have heard say, that even "amongst you here at Rome, some have sought to advance and set themselves aloft by currying fa"vor and flattering the common people: and that the time was, when the commons rose and de"serted from among you so as the rule of the common-weal and people of Rome was out of your "hands, as in a very Anarchy. If such a thing as this might chance in this your City (so well quali"fied & ordered as it is) how can any man make a wonder, that among us there have been some,
 "who (affecting and seeking for the amity and friendship of the Kings) might haply corrupt and se-
 "duce our commons with their naughty counsel? And yet when all is said, they prevailed no more "than thus, that we sat still and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-passe in this "place the greatest and most grievous crime of all other wherewith our City is charged during "this war, and that is this. At one and the same time we sent Embass, both to you and Perseus a"bout a peace. This disengagement (so untoward and unlucky as it was, a furious and brainisick orator "and agent of ours (as afterwards we understood) handled as foolishly: who (as it is for certain "known) framed his language in that manner, as if he had been C. Popilius the Roman Embassador,
 "whom ye sent to the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemaus, to warn them both to lay down arms &
 "surcease

"surcease war. But that behaviour of his, (call it what you will, either pride or folly) was no worse
 "before you than it was to K. Perseus. Every City hath their conditions, and qualities by them"selves, like as particular and several persons: and temblably it is in whole nations, some are terry
 "and cholerick, bold and audacious, others again be fearful and timorous: some are given to wine
 "and drunkennes, others to women and wantonnes. The people of Athenis (by report) are too
 "hasty, hot, and forward to enterprize any thing even beyond their power. The Lacedæmonians
 "again, be as slow and backward, calling many doubts & difficulties to enter upon the very things "which they are assured of. I cannot deny, but that all the country of Asia in general breedeth
 "many a mad brain and vain spirit: and I will not say, but that our people are jolly fellows of their "tongue and can speak big, for that we seem (among other cities and states becoming upon us)
 "to excel and surpass: and that no so much in the confidence we have of our own forces, as for the "honorable regard ye have had of us and the great testimonies and judgments ye have given in our
 "of us, but that foolish embassage of ours even then at the very time had punishment sufficient,
 "being sent away (as it was) with so heavy an answer of yours: and if we were not then disgraced
 "and shamed enough, now truly this present embassage so humble and pitiful, were able to make "full satisfaction for a more insolent embassy than it was, All pride (and arrogancy of words) de"ceitful cholerick persons indeed hate, wile men deride, and namely, from an inferior to his bet"ter: but no man ever judged it a mortal sin and worthy of death: may here we shall it edgier,
 "least haply the Rhodiens might seem thereby to despise the Romans. How therefore there is no time
 "also that cannot rule their tongue, but will be railing & uttering blasphemous words against it
 "C Gods: yet we never heard of any that have been therefore smitten dead with a thunder bolt.
 "What remaineth then for us wherein we should purge and clear our selves, if we neither can be, "charged in fact with hostility: and if our embassy hath need some proud and presumptuous words
 "more than became him, which I deserve not the total ruin of our City but some harsh checks and "hard rebukes on both sides of our ears? But I hear (my good LL.) that in your ordinary talk a"mong your selves when ye are together, we are censured for our inward affection only & secret
 "thoughts, and condemned no less than for some deed, namely, That in heart we are out of the K.
 "and wished him rather than you to obtain the victory: and therefore they deem us worthy to be "persecuted with fire and sword. Some there be again of you, who think verily that thus indeed
 "we stood affected howbeit they would not have us for to be ware upon as enemies: for that
 "D it standeth not with the custom or law of any City in the world, That if a man with a mischief "to his enemy, he should be straightwaies condemned therefore to die, so long as he hath not en"tered into any action tending thereto. And verily these men we have to thank, who free & quit "us yet from punishment, although they clear us not of guilt: howbeit this sentence we pass a"gainst our own selves, That if it can be proved, that we were all of us so minded and disposed in "affection as we are burdened, (for content us are that all under one heart and hand will and "deed, without distinction) then let us all be punished for it and feel the smart. But if of the great "men and chief among us, some affected you & others the Kings; we require not, that for the love
 "of us who sided with you, the Kings suppose should fare the better and escape clear: but we re"quest and beseech rather that for their sakes we perish not and be quit undene. And certain"ly your own selves are not worse affected and more let against them than our very City is, which "they knowing well enough most of them either fled away, or else killed themselves: others of "them (such as we have condemned and passed judgement against) shall be as your prisoners (my "LL.) to do with them what you will. All the rest of us Rhodiens, as thanks we have merited none "in this war, so we have deserved as little punishment. Lay the over-deed and surprisall of our "former good deeds and demerits to this want of duty now and let the heap of the one make up
 "the scant measure of the other. With three Kings of late years ye have maintained War: let not "our lackness and sitting still in this one, endamage and hurt us more, than our devoir and em"ploiment in the other twain may seem to satisfy and countervail. Set Philippus, Antiochus and Per-"seus, for three verdicts and sentences as it were passed upon us: two of them acquit us clear: the "F third is doubtful whether it will go against us or no. Indeed if they themselves were to sit upon "us, we should no doubt be cast and condemned: but you (my good LL.) that are our competent "judges determine now at once. Whether there shall be a City of Rhode remaining upon the face "of the earth, or be rased utterly & destroyed from the very foundation for ever for you are not "to debate in council about making war upon us: which we you may begin and go in hand with
 "at your pleasure: but follow and manage you never shall, because there is not a Rhodian that will "take arms and come into the field against you. Will you not be satisfied but persist fill in your
 "choler and anger: then will we crave at your hands some respite of time, whiles we may go home "and report there how we have perished in this lamentable embassage of ours. And then, all of us in
 "Rhodes frank-born and of free condition every one, I say, man and woman with all our wealth
 "and substance will embark our selves, forsake we will our privat houses and publick edifices: and
 "G to Rome straight will we all come: and when we have laid on heaps here in your common hall,
 "and at the porch and enter of your council-house, whatsoever gold and silver we have either
 "in privat purse or common chest, commit we will to your devotion and mercy our own persons,
 "together with the bodies of our wives and children: and never will we go further but even here
 "in this place will we suffer and abide that which we have to undergoe and endure. Let our City
 "then be sacked, rifled and burned, so it be far enough out of our eye that we see it not. The Ro"mans

"mans may (if it please them) judge the Rhodians enemies: yet you will give us leave to pass in "some sort a doom of our own. That we in our consciences never condemned our selves for such,
 "nor ever will enter in any hostile action against you, come what will, even the utmost extremity
 "that can be suffered. After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell down again all prostrate,
 "and as humble suppliant petitions put forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length
 "they were raised up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senate. Then began the L.L. within,
 "to give their opinions and pass their sentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously
 "bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedonia, as Consuls. Pre"tors, or Lieutenants; but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that stood to them and supported "their cause right earnestly, a man otherwise by nature low and severe, but as then he shewed him"self a mild and gracious Senator. I will not infer here the lively portraiture and resemblance
 "of that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered: his very "oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origines. In fine, the Rhodians
 "received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, nor yet remained in the nature "and quality of friends. The principal persons of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Asty-"medes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, that Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should "report this answer at Rhodes: and that Astymedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome,
 "to know what was practised and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their "Citizens at home. For that present the L.L. of the Senate gave them in charge, to remove their Cap"tains and Governours by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, im"porting matter (in itself considered) of grief & heaviness, turned into joy in regard that they were "eased from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted (lest that they should have had hot war.
 "And therefore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000
 "pieces of gold, and with this present they lent Theodatus the Admiral of their navy in embassage.
 "A will and desire they had to make suit unto the Romans for association: but so as not to act and or"dinance of the people should be entered thereof, nor any instrument engrosed as touching it. And
 "this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they missed of their "purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this privilege, and was permitted to treat "of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many "years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such sort, as they never linked and "tied themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other "reason in the world, but because they would neither cut the kings off from all hope of their aid,
 "if haply any of them might stand in such need, nor disabie themselves of the possibility they had to "reap some fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (he thinks)
 "they ought to have sought sadly and in good earnest for their society, not so much for safety and "security against others (for none they feared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspi"cion and jealousy which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Carians also re"volved from them, and they of Mylissa took certain Towns of the Euxemestians. Now were the "hearts of these Rhodians within the City not so much broken or abated, but they saw well en"ough that if the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria all the rest would either by way of re"volt put themselves in liberty and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and "seized by the neighbouring nations bordering upon them: and that then they should be pent up and "shut within the compass of a small Isle and the strands of a barren soil, not able to nourish and "maintain the inhabitants of so great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched "and sent forth their youth, and not only for- ed the Carians (notwithstanding they had joined "unto them the aid of the Cybirs) to their obeisance, but also in battel near Orthesia overcome
 "the Mylaeans and Alabandians: who having disfigured the Euxemestians of their province, ad"vanced jointly with their united armies against them.

While these affairs thus passed there, while some occurrences fell out in Macedonia, and others likewise at Rome, L. Anticus having subdued King Genius (as is before said) and brought him under his own hand, pla ed a garrison in Scodra the Kings royal seat, and appointed Gabinus the Captain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia two commodious cities of good importance, he ordained
C. Licinius the Governor. Having thus made over the rule of Illyricum unto these twain, himself with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phana was the first that yielded unto him and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their inshules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also he passed over into the country of Mylissa where he received the surrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Paffiron. The principal men and rulers of that City were Antinous and Theodatus, men of mark and name: as well for the favor they bare to Perseus, as the hatred they carried to the Romans: the only persons who had conspired and perswaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. These two having guilty consciences within them for their privat treasels, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and be overwhelmed with the total ruin of their own country: and therewith they exhorted the multitude to prefer present death before servitude and slavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict these so great and mighty persons. At length a certain noble young Gentleman, named also Theodatus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame the

At the self fear of the rulers at home, "What all ye my masters (sd. he) and fellow citizens, what rage
 "and madnes hath metted you, to enwrap and interres the whole City in the taunt and folly of these "two perfids? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their country have willingly lost "their lives, but to think it meet, that their country should perish for them, these are the first
 "that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to that empire, "into which the whole world besides is subject. As he spake these words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & Theodatus saw, they made no more ado, but brake upon the first words guard of the enemies which they came unto and exposing their bodies to the swords point, were soon killed, and the Town was yielded into the hands of the Romans. Tegmon also, upon the like wilful obstinacy of Prince Cephala, had shut their gates, but after that he was slain, the Town was taken by surrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the assault.
 Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious Towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general assembly at Scodra, to which he had summoned the principal States of the whole nation and whither also there were arrived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and solemn session he pronounced from the Tribunal seat, by the advice of the council assistant unto him, That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himself would withdraw the garrisons out of their Towns, Fortresses and Castles. As for the Ilseans, Tantalians, Tritunians in the Discretians country, Rhizonits and Olcinians (for that whiles Genius his fortune stood upright they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and priviledged from all tributes. The Doarrians also, for leaving Caracantium, and passing with their armies to side with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, D. Sura, and Selcopia, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moiety of the tribute which they had yielded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labats: and the third, of the Agrani, Onites, Rhezonits, Olcinians, and those that bound and border upon them. Having let down this order in Illyricum, he returned to Phaena City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

While these things hapned in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legats, sent *Q.
 Maximus* his son (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the laccage of Egionum and Agassae. The quarrel against Agassae was for that they having delivered the Town once to Martinus the Consul, and therewith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithstanding afterwards to Perseus. As for the Aeginians, they had committed a late and fresh revolt: for giving no credit to the fame that was voiced of the Romans victory, they cruelly handled certain Roman founders, who were entered into their City. Moreover, he sent L. Posthumus likewise to smatch in hostile manner the City of the Enians, for that they had perfided in arms more than in their neighbour Cities. Now was it about that season of the year which men call Autumn: in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all Greece round, and to see those places whereof there were great a name, and which were more renowned by hear-say than known by sight of eye: he left C. Sulpicius Alaius for the command and guard of the camp, & let forward in his progress, accompanied with no great train. And being guarded of the one hand with his own son Scipio, and on the other, with Atrox the brother of King Bithynies, he passed through Thessaly, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Where, after he had sacrificed to Apollon, he destined and appointed those Columns & Pillars (which were begun in the porch of that Temple, and whereupon the statues of King Perseus should have been erected) for to sustain and bear the statues of himself with the title Victorious. He visited also the temples of *J. p.
 Trophon* in Lebadeia: where, after he had seen the mouth of that peashift cave into which they were to descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Gods: he let sacrifice also done to Jupiter and Hercinnus, whose temple there is to be seen he went down to Chalcis, to behold the frith of Eurippus, and that Island which 10 times past was united & joined to the firm continent by a bridge. From Chalcis he crossed over to Andu three miles distant from thence, a port enabled for the rode some time there of Agamemnon fleet, consisting of a thousand sail. Being there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamemnon) offered his own daughter in sacrifice upon her altar, to have a prosperous voyage for his fleet intending to sail to Troy. After this, he came to Oranpa a Town in Attica, where Amphichloctus the Prophet is worshipped as a God. There, was to be seen an ancient Temple, most pleasant to behold for the goodly Fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athens: a City likewise for antiquity of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many monuments also worth the seeing: namely, the citadel, the heavens, the walls that reach from the City to Pyramus, the arseinals made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods: and of men likewise, so rare & excellent, as well for the artificial workmanship, as the matter whereof they were made. When he had sacrificed within the City to Minerva the goddess and patroness of the said citadel, he kept on his journey, and the next day following arrived at Corinth. A fair & beautiful City this was in those daies, before it was destroyed, the fortres there and the Isthmus were things of especial mark and worth the sight: for the said fortres notwithstanding it be mounted up to an exceeding height above all yet is it full of fountains: and the Isthmus by a narrow ride of land divideth two seas neer together, the one lying East, and the other West. From thence he went to Sicjon and Argos, two noble Cities and so forward to Epidaurum, nothing in wealth comparable

to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rolls they had found the letters of the principal Statemen of other nations; but of the Achæans there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them, were nothing evident.

After the Ætolians were dismissed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; only Leucas was exempt from doing service to the high court and general assembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the inquisition still farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King, they extended their commission as far as into Asiatic and sent Labio to demolish and raze Aurissia a City in the Isle Lebos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Metymnia: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor in their haven to the provisions of Antenor the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Lebos with his pinnaces. Two there were that lost their heads, men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronicus the Ætolian, son of Andronicus, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome; and Neen a Theban, by whose advice and perswasion they had contracted a society with Perseus.

After this enquest of offraire causes interposed and coming between, the assembly of the Macedonians was called again: wherein as touching the state of Macedony, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certain Senators chosen, whom they call Synedræ, by whose counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This at first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians, that it was all done for their liberty. For nominated there were, the Kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garrisons, who were wont to serve the King basely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiously: some exceeding rich and wealthy, others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living: all faring at their table, and arrayed in apparel like KK, not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to hear of laws, or of equal liberty. All these therefore, who had been employed in any ministry or service about the King, even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were, had commandment to depart, out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatened with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with such diligent care and regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such laws (I say) as the very practise and tryal of long time (the only corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control.

After these serious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a solemnity of game and disport at Amphipolis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation whereof he had both sent out his messengers to the States of Asia and to the KK, and also himself in his circuit and visitation of the Grecian Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profession of such plaies and pastimes; besides a sort of wrestlers, champions, and brave horses of the best kind & breed. Also divers embassages with their beasts for sacrifices, and whatsoever else was usually done of custom, at the great and solemn games in Greece. Thus it came to pass, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wisdom also in exhibiting these shews and fights, wherein the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he seated and banqueted the Embass, in the same sumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common saying of his, That none could make feasts and set forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having represented these solemnities of all sorts, and bestowed all the brazen shields on shipboords, all other armor and weapons of sundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his prayers made to Mars, Minerva, Lucas and other Gods and Goddesses, unto whom of right and duty appertained to consecrate and dedicate the spoils of enemies: himself the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the military colonels standing round about, cast every man his fire-brand, and set all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe & Asia, where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testify their joy in his behalf as to see the shews and disports: in that meeting, I say, of so great armies of sea-servitors and land-souldiers, there was that plenty of all things and cheapness of victuals, that Emilius the General, of that exceeding store and abundance, gave much away freely to privat persons, to cities and nations, not only for their violent but also to carry home with them, into their countries. And this multitude there assembled took for more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing men practise feats of bodily strength and activity, or in the running of horses in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian booty and pillage laid all abroad to be seen; namely, of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth, of silver vessels in gold, in silver, in copper, and ivory, most curiously wrought in that total tear and City of Pella; not only to serve for a present shew and no more (like those that the Kings Palace of Alexandria was replenished with) but also for continual and everlasting use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cn. Octavius to be transported to Rome. Paulus after he had given the Embassadors a gracious and courteous farewell, passed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Amphipolis. From thence he dislodged and journeyed untill he came on the fifth day as far as Pella.

A Pella. And passing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelæum, and then he sent P. Naficus, and Q. Maximus his own son with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the waite unto those Illyrians, who had succored Perseus in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Oricum. Himself marching toward Epirum, at the fifteenth removed arrived at Passaron. Not far from thence lay Anticus encamped: unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution, signifying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirum, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, he bestowed certain Centurions, and lent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians; & he supposed out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certain cohorts and companies of souldiers to every of the said Cities: they who were assigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the nearer; and this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to do. In the morning betimes all the gold and silver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a signal was given to the souldiers to fall to ranke and rifle the Cities. Wherein they found so great store of pillage, that every horiman had for his part a good Denarii, and the footmen 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand pils were led away into captivity. Then the whole

C Were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the booty and prizes were sold, and out of that mass of money were the souldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea-side, unto Oricum. But the souldiers minds were nothing so well satisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and enry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedony. At Oricum he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of S. Naficus and Maximus his son; there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy. In like manner a few daies after, Anticus, when the session and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, having given commandment, that their principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whole causes he referred and referred thither) himself attended the ships which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Italy.

D At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirum, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes arrived in Asia. A successe of affairs for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamum the city winter, where also he lay grievously sick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to stir and look abroad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synæda, Eumenes had alighted his forces from all parts to Sardis. There at Synæda, the Romans parled with Sollicitus the General of the Gauls: Attalus also went with them; but though good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of stirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choise of the one side or other. So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls abroad: and when he had done he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and less tractable: inasmuch as it might seem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolomæus (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gauls.

To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perseus and Anticus were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children: after them, the multitude besides of prisoners, then consequently those Macedonians as afo the other chief peers of Greece, who were wanted to repair unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make appearance there, who had been seen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters missive peremptory, who were reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulus himself a few daies after embarked in a ship of the Kings, a Galeace of a mighty bigness, making way with sixteen banks and rowes of oars to a side, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoil: not only of brave gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings, stiffe & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Anticus and Perseus arrived also with their fleet, and to all three by an act of the Senat was triumph granted. Q. Cassius the Prior had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senat, that they should prefer a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in full communion of command and government that day when they were to ride triumphant into the City. See, how mean things escape the touch of envy, but the highest commonly are met with. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Anticus, nor yet of Perseus. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been ashamed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of slanderous & malicious tongues. His souldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their service. And to them he had given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more sparingly & with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings: and yet in good faith to say a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedy desire, and dealt still amongst them till they had cried Ho, he should have left himself just nothing to have brought into the common treasury. So that all this Macedonian army gave a shew by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their General, either to appear, or to give their voices for the letting forward of the bill aforesaid, as touching his triumph and plenary power of command, when the day of assembly should come. Over and besides, Ser. Sulpitius Galba, who had been a martial Colonel in the second legion in Macedony, and in private civility with the General; both himself in person was in hand with him, and by the souldiers also of his own legion solicited and spurred on the rest to appear in sufficient number, there for to give their suffrages against him, and check the bill: saying, "That as he was an imperious and Lordly commander, so he was as miserable a pinner: penury withal, and a good deed it were to deny his grace and to cross the law proposed for his triumph, & for to be revenged of him through y: for no doubt the commons of the City would y: go that way that they should see the souldiers to lead before. He could not forsooth (say they) give money among his souldiers liberally: well, he shall surely know, that his souldiers yet can give him honour; but never let him look for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath deserved none. These words let them agog; and when Tib. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read out and published the aforesaid bill in the Capitol, and that by permission of law any private person might have spoken thereto; and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no doubt & question was to be made: then Servilius Galba suddenly leapt forth and required of the Tribune, That (so far as much as it was to farforth dayes, as being the eight hour thereof, so that he had not time enough to declare and shew at large, what allegations he had why they should not grant L. Aemilius a triumph) they would adjourn the assembly to the next day and betimes in the morning let the matter on foot again; for that he had need of a whole day and no less, to plead that cause to the full as he should do. But when the Tribune willed him again to speak his mind that day, if he had ought to say; he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alleging, "How precisely and rigorously he had exacted at their hands all military duties; how he had imposed upon the souldiers more painful & dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wise in dealing rewards and bestowing honourable recompences for good service, he was over-strait-laced & too short in every point: and verily souldiery and warfare, if it continued still under such Captains, will be more hard travel and rough to souldiers and warriors: but when all is done and victory obtained, rewarded it shall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. Certainly, the Macedonians are in better case yet than the Roman souldiers. But if they would be present in great frequency the next morning for to deny and revoke this bill, then these rich and mighty men shall know full well, that all lieth not in the hands of the Captain and Commander, but that the souldiers also can do some war. The souldiers animated and induced with these perilous words, resorted to the day following in so great multitudes and pestered the whole Capitol so full, as none but they could come in to give their voice. The first tribes that were called in, clearly called the grace: which when the principal and chief men of the City saw they ran all into the Capitol with open mouth crying out upon this indignity offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror in so great and dangerous a war, should be deprived of his due triumph; and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now subjugated and embroiled to the loose licentiousness and greedy avarice of their souldiers. In this one thing (say they) have we too too much faulted, such hath been our favour and partiality, and so forth have we been to displease any: but what will become of us in the end if souldiers once may come to be Lords and masters, and thus to crow over their Generals? And every man railed and cried out upon G. Iba. In the end after this garbail was appeared, M. Servilius who sometime had been Consul and great master of the horse under the Dictator, requested the tribunes that they would begin all again annulling that which was past, and give him leave withal to make a speech before the people. The Tribunes were aside to consult of this matter and in fine, over-ruled with the authority and countenance of the nobles and peers of the City, began to treat afresh and go in hand with all matters and making it known openly that they would recalc back those first tribes, in case M. Servilius and other private men who were willing to utter their mind to the cause had once spoken. Then said Servilius as followeth, "Matters and friends citizens here of Rome, if by nothing else it might be judged, how singular & how excellent a Commander L. Aemilius was in the field, this only (if there were no more) may suffice, that having in his camp such sedicious and light-headed persons or his souldiers, and an adversary of his own among them, so noble of birth, so rash of action, and withal so arrogant and self-conceited, ready to incite and stir up a multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutiny at all in his whole army. The same civility it was in government & conduct, that held them in awe and good order, which they durst not quench nor give offence. As for Servilius Galba if (like a new barrister who is) shew the first proofs, or to give the assay and hanel of his eloquence he would have made choice of L. Paulus to begin withal and accule him at the bar, he should not have hindered his triumph, which (if there were nothing else to dissuade and draw him back) the Senat had judged to be just & due: but the morrow after his triumph (when he had seen him a private man again) he might have given presentment of his name, & by order of law ministered interrogatories unto him and to entred process: or rather he might have said a little longer, namely, until himself had been a Magistrat in place, and then have gone roundly to work, arrested him upon an action

of Servilius
in the behalf of Paulus.

A to answer at day, and so accused him judicially before the people. Thus should L. Aemilius have had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well-doing, in that so nobly & valiantly he had conducted this war: thus likewise should he have suffered condign punishment, if he had committed ought unworthy either of his ancient glory or this new honor. But will you have the truth? when he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with, he sought by wiles and indirect means to detract his well deserved praises. He demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse L. Paulus: and * four hours, even all the day time that was left he spent in making an invective against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the bar so culpable and sinful, but all the faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in so many hours space? But what objected he all that while, that L. Paulus if he were to frame his defence, would with to deny O that some man would procure me here for the while, two assemblies and courts, the one of Roman souldiers employed lately in Macedony, the other more pure and uncorrupt of the twain, namely, of citizens founder in judgment, void of all favor & cleer from hatred. And the people of Rome I would have to be the judge. First, let Paulus be accused in the grand assembly & court of the citizens. Tell me, O S. Galba, what would you say against him before those Quirites of Rome. For there you should have been cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your oration, carrying these terms, You looked too freightly & precisely to the corpi de guard in their stations; you held the souldiers too hard to their watch and ward; the sentinels were neerly and narrowly looked unto; & you were over curious about going the rounds & relieving the watch in the night (season about the works and fabricks you put the souldiers to more toiling & moiling than heretofore whiles you, my L. General, their surveior, over-ler, and task-maker, rode all about to exact the utmost with all extremity: in one & the same day when you had the army on foot, presently from a journey you led them forth to battail; when the victory was got, you would not suffer the souldier to breathe and take repose, but caused him to march immediately & to follow the enemy in chase also, whereas the booty to be parted & shared out might have enriched your self, yet will you carry the Kings treasure in shew of triumph & then lay it up in the chamber of the City. As these be shrewd matters, like sharp goads to prick those souldiers & set them on, who think they have not scope enough to serve their disloyal loins, or too small allowance to content their covetous appetites: so with the people of Rome they would have nothing at all prevailed: who if they should not call to mind examples & stories of old, which they have heard their fathers talk of famously, what overthrows have been received through the indigence and popularity of Generals; and contrarywise what victories have been achieved by their severe discipline and government: yet at least will they cannot chuse but remember what odds & difference there was in the late Punick war, between M. Minutius General of the horse, and Q. Fabius Max, his Dictator. And therefore since the accuser might know all this, the defence of Paulus in this behalf was altogether needless and unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience and assembly of the Macedonian souldiers. But now me thinks I must not say you Quirites any more, but souldiers: if haply there be so much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you to blush, & be ashamed for very shame of the world, to offer abuse unto your Generals. And verily for mine own part, I find a great change in my self, & am otherwise affected in my mind, now that I seem to speak unto an army of souldiers, than ere-whiles I was, when my oration was accommodated and framed to the commons of a City. Now souldiers, what say you to the matter? Is there any one at Rome (but Perseus again) that would not have a triumph over the Macedonians? Are you not ready to pull such a one in pieces with those very hands, wherewith you vanquished the Macedonians? He, who soever he is, that impeacheth you for entering into the City in triumph, trust me truly, would have debarr'd you of victory if it had bin in his power. Lo how foully are ye deceived (souldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor only of the General, and not of the souldiers likewise, and consequently of the whole people of Rome. This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise there have been, who when they could not obtain triumph at the hands of the Senate, triumphed nevertheless upon the Alban mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honor due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Lucatius of his glory for ending the first Punick war, P. Cornelius for the second; or others besides who after their triumphed. It is not triumph that can make L. Paulus better or worse, either the greater captain or the less. Herein consisteth the credit, renown & reputation of the souldiers and of all the people of Rome more than his: for let left they be reputed & noted either for envious & malicious, or else unthankful for their best members & noblest citizens: & therein seem to imitate the people of Athenes who ever more persecute and plague with envy their best men that live amongst them, Your ancestors and forefathers when time was faulted this wates enough twis in the person of Camillus, whom they offered abuse unto, before the City by his means was recovered out of the Gauls hands. Much you may be to blame your selves here, & overmuch too in P. Africanus. That in Literum, his mansion house and place of habitation (who was the conqueror of Africa) should be shewed: that in Literum (the sepulchre of P. Africanus) should be seen. Let us blush for very shame, that L. Paulus as he is equal to them in glory and honor, should likewise go with them and have his part of your hard and wrongful dealing. The first thing that ye do then, let be this: Out with this spot & stain of any which ye have caught so reproachful in regard of other nations. Lo hurt not to your selves. For who will ever hereafter wish to be like Africanus? who will endeavor to

"publick felicity of the City. At my departure from Italy, I looked from Brundisium, and serup sail¹⁴ at the sun-rising: by the ninth hour of the same day I arrived safe with all my ships at Corfu. The fifth day after I came to Delphi, where I sacrificed unto Apollo, for my self, for your armies and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the league. Whereafter, "I had received the charge of the army, and altered some things which might greatly have hindered the victory, I marched forward, for that the enemies camp was inexpugnable, and the King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the passage, I went as far as Petra: so as by this means having perforce drawn the King to fight, I vanquished him in plain field and ranged battel, Macedony I subdued, and brought it in subjection to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Consuls before me so managed, as each one left it ever to his successor worse than he found it, I achieved I and brought to a final end in fifteen daies. I followed then in this train other prosperous affairs, as the fruits ensuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedony yielded unto me. The Kings treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and put him into my hands) took prisoner, with his sons in the Temple of the Samothracians. But then my heart misgave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing favour of my good fortune: then cast I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at sea, having so mighty a mass of the Kings treasure to transport, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy. But seeing all things fall out to hearts desire, a prosperous voyage, a safe arrival and whatsoever I could pray for at Gods hands; this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when she is at the highest pitch, to turn back again and come as fast down) that mine own Kingdom, rather than the Common-weal, might feel a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City came. And therefore I hope that this so notable a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City for having any other misfortune, since that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the changes of this world) hath fallen so just between the funerals of my two sons. See how I and Perseus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable condition of man. To how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewise led captives before his face, hath them yet living found and safe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from the buriall of one of my sons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence descended again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Aemilius. For two of them the house of the Cornelii and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of children: so as now, in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this calamity and ruin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfort and consolation again. Their words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and stonied them more, than if he had lamentably moned himself unto them with piteous tears, for his childless estate and desolate condition.

C. Octavius solemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the fifth day of December: in which solemnity, he neither had prisoners led in shew, nor spoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and sailors seventy and five Denarii apiece: to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this the Senat assembled, and the LL. ordained, That Q. Cassius should M lead King Perseus with his son Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, silver, or what moveables and furniture soever he had to Alba, there to be kept in sure custody. Birius the Kings son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Carthago, there to lie in safe ward. As for the rest of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison.

Some few daies after these things, there arrived Embassadors from Cotys King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the ransom of his son and the other hostages. Into the Senat they were brought: where, by way of preamble they laid this offer for the ground at their speech, That Cotys had not sided with King Perseus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hostages: then they besought the LL. of the Senat to suffer them to be redeemed at what price soever they would let down, were it never so high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senat, "That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which they had with Cotys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hostages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excuse their trespass and fault: considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation flood in fear and awe of him, much less then, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Romans. Howbeit although Cotys preferred the favour of Perseus before the friendship of the people of Rome, yet they would consider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was meet for his estate than his desert and what he was worthy to have; and therefore they would release his son and the hostages, and send them home again. As for the people of Rome, their manner is to bestow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence: the worth and estimation whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than require and demand the same presently. So there were Embassadors nominated to reconduct the hostages into Thrace to wit, T. Quintus Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Cinnius Rebilus. And to those Thracian Embassadors were given by way of presents 2000 asses apiece. So Birius with the rest of the hostages was sent for from Carthago, and with the fore-named Embassadors returned again to his father.

The

A The Kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and monstrous bignes before time, were landed upon Maris field and there laid up drie. Whiles the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph remained still not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men, L. Antius triumphed over King Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feast Quirinalia. It was generally thought that all things therein rather resembled home likenes in shew, than otherwise countervailed in substance the former triumph. The General himself Antius was inferior to Emilius both in nobility and also in quality of person: and setting together their places of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Consul: neither was Gentius equal to Perseus, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for spoil, money for money, gifts for gifts, there was no proportion nor comparison between them. And therefore as that itself late triumph was more resplendent and glorious than this, so considered in it self without other respect it was not to be found fault withal and despised. Antius within few daies had vanquished and thoroughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians: both by Sea and Land proud and mighty, bearing themselves stout and bold for their strong and fenced forts. The King he took prisoner and those of the Kings race and roial blood. He shewed in triumph many field-ensigns, besides ocher spoils and moveable goods of the King. Likewise of gold seven and twenty pound weight, and of silver nineteen besides 3000 Denarii, and a hundred and twenty thousand peeces of Illyrian silver incoin. Before his chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children: Carvavius also the Kings brother, and certain noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denarii apiece, to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the horsemen a triple. To the allies of the Laetina nation he allowed as much as to citizens: the sailors and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he surmounted the triumph of Emilius, for that his soldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more joynd and merry and the General was praised and extolled in many a ditty and ballad. Antius writeth, That of his booty there was raised as much money as came to twenty millions of Sestertii, over and above the gold and silver that went into the common treasury. But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should be made, I have let down mine author for the thing, now, while you whether you will believe him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat led to Spolegium, there to be kept in ward: all the captives besides were at Rome cast into prison, and there lay. But when the Spoleitans refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, these Princes were translated from thence to Iguvium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty barks, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Cassius by the ordinance of the Senat gave and distributed among the citizens of Corfu, Apollonia, and Dyrbachium.

The Consuls that year after they had only wailed the territories of the Ligurians, because they could never train the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable service, returned to Rome for the choice of new Magistrats in the room of the old. And so the fifth consular or count day that came, they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpicius Gallus. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quintilius Varus, and Marcus Fomcius. These Pretors had their government in this manner: two for the jurisdiction within the City, two for Spain, the other for Sicily and Sardinia. This year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminusia. That year died C. Claudius the Augur, and in his place the collegd of the Augurs chose T. Quintius Luminus. Allo King Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same year departed this life. This year also came King Prusias to Rome with his son Nicomedes. He entered into the City with a great train attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Cassius the Pretor. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts: he said that his coming was to worship the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome, as also to salute the people of Rome, and withal to shew his own joy and to wish theirs for their happy victory over the two Kings Perseus and Gentius, and for that by subduing the Macedonians and Illyrians, they had enlarged their signory and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call a Senat for him even that present day if he would to himselfe he desired two daies respite to see the Temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to visit his good friends and acquaintance. L. Cornelius Scipio the treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew him all: who also had been sent as far as Carpus to meet him upon the way: also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally entertained. The third day after he came into the Senat, where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own demerits and good deiers during the war: and then requested, that he might have leave to pay his vows and namely, to sacrifice at Rome in the capitol, even head of greater beasts, and one at Prenefte to Fortuna. For that he said those vows were made for the victory of the people of Rome. Also that the league and alliance with him might be renewed, Item that the Land won by conquest from King Antiochus: which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveyed unto him by a deed of gift. Last of all he recommended his son Nicomedes to the Senat. He found much favour among all them who had been Generals of armies in Macedony. And therefore he obtained directly all other suits that he made: only as touching the said lands, this answer he had, That they would send certain commissioners to see and view the thing. "And if it appeared and fell out, that the foresaid land was appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already, they would repute King Prusias the worthiest man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands, But if it never belonged to King Antiochus, and so was plain and evident that the people of Rome had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a grant thereof already, Prusias then must be content and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts prejudicial and injurious to another. Neither could a thing never so freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleasure. As for Nicomedes his son, they would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands so recommended. And how careful and tender the people of Rome was over Kings children committed unto them to keep, may appear by Prolemus the King of Egypt. With this answer was Prusias dismissed. Order was given that he should be presented with a certain summe of sesterces, and with silver plate to the quantity of 50 pound weight. Also they ordained that his son Nicomedes should have gifts proportionable to that sum which was given Malagaba the son of Malanissa; also that beats and all other things appertaining to sacrifices, should be allowed unto the King out of the City-chamber, like as to the magistrates of Rome, shule whether he would slay and offer them at Rome or Perseis. Also that out of that fleet which rid in the harbor of Byzantium, there should be twenty galies assigned him to use, until such time as the King were arrived at the fleet which was given him. Finally, that L. Cornelius Scipio should accompany him and never depart from him, but bear the charges both of him and his retinue about him until they were embarked and on shipboard. It is said, that the King joied wonderfully at this courtesy and kindness offered him by the people of Rome and that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him: only he commanded his son to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our Historians written as touching K. Prusias. But Polybius reporteth, that this King was unworthy the Majesty of so honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the Embassadors of Rome with his head shaven and a cap upon it also to acknowledge and call himself the freed villain and vassal of the people of Rome, and to testify so much, he wore the badge and token of that degree and condition. At Rome likewise when he entered the Councel-house, he stooped down and kissed the very door-sill, calling likewise the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have used other speeches not so honorable to the hearers, as bafe and unfitting his own person. When he had joined in and about the City not above thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortieth book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great main and blemish of the Latine tongue, and no small grief of learned men) is lost, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decad. For as it appeareth by L. Florus the Epitomis there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remain at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Francis Petrarch saith, Levy wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sigonius probably conjectureth, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this later number. How all these complete books of T. Livius should miscarry, it is not certainly known. Some hope there is that they are but mis-cast and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred years some fragments of the story were discovered in Moguncie: and the last five books now extant, found by Simon Grineus in the Library of a monastery over-against the City of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles, the son of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, &c. so we are not to despair of the rest. In the mean times, we must make much of these brief summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries in stead of the books: so I thought it not amiss (in hope that one day the very books themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather, for that neither he that translated Livy into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever see) have taken that pains.

Eumenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself indifferent between Petius and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms, That no King might repair to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be repented in enemy: nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleared of all fault. Cl. Mariellus the Consul subdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps, and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of King Prusias the Gauls, for that he invaded and wasted their borders; and they informed besides, that he had conspired with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest suit and entreaty of the Rhodiens, a league was contracted with them. The Consuls took a review and survey of the City, wherein were enrolled and taxed 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Amylius Lepidus was elected praetor of the Senat. Prolemus the King of the Egyptians was by his younger brother expelled out of his realm, but by the means of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his son Ariarathes came to the crown and by intercession and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth besides, the wars against the Ligurians, Corians, and Lusitanians, fought with variable fortune: the troubles also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his son a very child, his young Prince (together with his guardian Lysias) Demetrius the son of Seleucus (who had been sent in hostage to Rome) murdered privately, because he was not set at large and dismissed by the Romans, and so himself entered upon the Kingdom. L. Amylius Paulus who had conquered Petius, departed himself into corruption and abstinence from the publick treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both out of Spain and Macedony so great store of wealth, a drachter, yet when his goods were prized and sold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her dowry. The Pompeian warblers were drawn drie by Cor. Cethegus the Consul (unto whom that charge was by lot fallen) and the same turned into firm ground.

Of the XLVII. Book.

Cneus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongful cause with M. Amylius Lepidus the sovereign Pontiffe. The power and authority of the clergy might as yet be greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted touching the name suit for officers. In the survey of the City, there were taxed in the subsidy book 328314 Roman citizens. L. Amylius Lepidus was chosen again praetor of the Senat. Between the two brethren Prolemes, who were at variance, there passed this accord and agreement: That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrene. Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, by the publick power and forceable power of Demetrius King of Syria dispossessed of his Kingdom, was by the Senat set into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent as delegates from the Senat to determine of the intestine quarrel between Malanissa and the Carthaginians. C. Martius the Consul fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unfortunately, but afterwards achieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this; for that they had made wast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same action Cornelius Nafica the Consul brought in subjection. Q. Optimus the Consul subdued the Ligurians beyond the Alps, who had spoiled Antipolis and Nicea, two Towns belonging to the sovereignty of the Massiliens. Moreover, here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 598 year from the foundation of the City, the Consuls so soon as the assembly for election was past, and other Consuls chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was because the Spaniards were entered into rebellion. The Embassadors afore said who had been sent to take up and decide the controversy between Malanissa and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great store of ship-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Praetors accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book.

The Consuls took a review and tax of the city wherein were reckoned three hundred four and twenty thousand polls of citizens. The cause of a third Punic war be here recordd. Upon report that there was a right puissant army of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthaginians, conducted by Archobazanes the nephew of Syphax. M. Porcius Cato perceived in an oration to proceed war against the Carthaginians for that they entertained such a power within their frontiers under a colour against Malanissa, but in truth raised against the Romans: Tiberius Publius Cornelius Nafica counselld him and dissuaded the matter. Whereupon ordained it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage in special to observe what they did, and whereabouts they went. After they had given the Carthaginians

Senat a check and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the league they maintained forces, and were provided of timber and other stuff for a navy, they were willing to conclude a peace between Malanilla and them: so as Malanilla should forgo and part with the land in question. But Gilgo the son of Amilcar, a busy and seditious man, who then was sovereign Magistrate (nowwithstanding their Set) at promise to be rewarded by the award of the said Embassadors, incited them so by his persuasive remonstrances to war upon the Romans, that the Embassadors made shift to flee and save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related these news at Rome, the Senat already sit and bent against the Carthaginians were now by his words provoked much more. M. Porcius Cato performed the funerals of his son, deceased in his Prætorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability; for he was put poor. One Andronicus, who shortly made the world believe, that he was the son of Pericles the King of Macedony, was sent to Rome. M. Æmilius Lepidus, now six times chosen President of the Senat by the Censors, gave his son in freight charge before he died, to carry him forth to burial in a coach without linen clothes and the purple pall, and not to bestow in other of sequels above one denier: saying, that the funerals of the great and best personages are wont to be enrolled and honoured with the shews of images and titles, or done with sumptuous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of poisoning and secrecy. Pubilia and Licinia who were enticed for making away their husbands; put in statutes before the Senat: to be bound in good lands, and body for them; and after judicial process passed and their cause heard, by a decree of their kinsfolk suffered death. Gullilla the son of Malanilla gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was murthering and laying of soldiers; rigging and providing of a fleet; all preparations not done for war: and Publius Cornelius Nasica replied against him, but nothing was to be done inconsiderately, yet he went away. Though good it was to send them Embassadors, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledge to certify. L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumus Albinus the Consuls, when they took matters with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but press all, were committed by the Tribunes of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of soldiery. By occasion of the wars in Spain, which many times had been untowardly and unfortunately managed, when the City of Rome was so dismaided and daunted, that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martial Tribuneship, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant: P. Cornelius Æmilianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service whatsoever should be laid upon him: and by his own example stirred up all the rest to the love of warfare. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after him he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the slaves and nations of Celtiberia, saved the Væcans, Cantabrians, and other nations: and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Æmilianus the son of L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there a mortal Colonels, slew a Carthaginian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Interactia, he adventured a more dangerous enterprise: for he was the first of all others that scaled and mounted over the wall. Servilius Sulpicius Galba the Prætor shed but lately in a battle against the Portugals. When as the Embassadors were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gullilla the son of Malanilla, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an army and also an armada: thought it was to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat: where Cato and other principall Senators were of opinion and gave advice, to transport an army posthaste into Africk: but because C. Nasica opined as I said, That he saw as yet no just and sufficient cause, they agreed they army forth, then they agreed it was, that the Consuls next following in place of government should propose at touching the Panick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Consuls had been put forth to no known frame, and it up at a price, through the means of Pub. Cornelius Nasica: who inferred, that it was a piece of work, unprofitable, yeas, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens: by virtue of an Act of Senat demand it was pulled down; so as the people for along time stood on their feet to behold the publick playes. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Malanilla. But was opposed there were in field by him (who notwithstanding he now was so foreworn yeare old and rievold, yet he did so fast his meat simply without any dainties yeas and so clew his bare breast still) and over and besides they desired to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

The beginning of the third Panick war, in the six hundred and one year from the Cities foundation, which within 5 years after it began, came to a full and small end. Much diversity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wisest, and Scipio Nasica, who by the Senat was indeed the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to destroy Carthage quite: Nasica contrariwise dissuaded what he could. Not without, in the end ordained it was. That because against covenant and accord they kept a navy at sea, and had forth an armada out of their borders: also for that they entred into arms and levied men upon Malanilla, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, and received into their Town Gullilla his son, who was in the company of the Roman Embassadors; was should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and taken the seas, the Embassadors of Utica repaired to Rome, yielding themselves and all that they had. That embassy, as a speciall preface to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentium (a place it was in Campus Martius, whereupon the p. sime Terentius took their name) were places exhibited exhibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred years before in the first Panick war, and in the five hundred year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold still their former determination, and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward to their journey to the war. Who having passed the sea and arrived in Africk, received of them three hundred hostages, whom they had required a day demanded: and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war so was there from the LL. of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place: so that it was ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rise and take arms again. L. Marius and M. Manilius the Consuls, began to beseege and assault Carthage: during which siege and assault it happened that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the whom they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Africanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain lance and fort of the Romans, which the enemies by night assaulted, with the help of a few horsemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthaginians had sallied forth of their City to give the assault at once upon it with all their forces: by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when at the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrats) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Adrubal, who with another power of men kept the narrow freights of a certain passage, he compassed the said Consul, not to give battle in a place of such disadvantage: but after words overweighed and born down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wisdom as virtue) he also entred into the narrow freights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was discovered and put to flight, and two cohorts beset round and invested by the enemies, he with certain small cornets of horse returned into those freights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senat, that in those terms he gave out and said, * That all the rest who were employed in the wars of Africk, served as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides call such favour and good liking to him, that at the next elections, most of the tribes picked him for to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Commons had promulgated a Law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition, yielded to the people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were sold in France) should be restored to their freedoms: M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that Law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, when he was by him picked up and point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two sons: being * Prætextatus, and a son of C. Sulpicius who of Guardians he was, and made such piteous and tender move, all the while he stood in his own cause, that the foresaid Law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be seen against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed Laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confessed and avowed the killing of the Portugals: excused near unto him: for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had sacrificed on horse and a man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his army. Andronicus one of best birth and the most chastest lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Pericles son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whither Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious flight) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit false title of his, as if it had been a true one and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the goodwill of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hand. Now had he decayed and framed the present in this wife. That Pericles the King had begotten him (forsooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to * one Cyrtella to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if single (should fall out) he well into the K. in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might he yet some good use: it were and issue remaining of the Kings blood and royal race. When Pericles was deceased he had his education at Adramyrium until he was 12 years old, supposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and wist not at all from what stock he was descended. Now it fell out (as it be) that the said foster father of mine lay very sick: and being at the point of death, he wist in length his faith and parentage. Pericles, which he was to deliver unto me when I surpassed mother, led with the first manual of King her most freights of all lovers, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age as I said, then the boy was given me, wherein mention was made of two children of a true left for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but only reputed, bewailed my birth unto me, who was fortune ignorant of mine own defect: also I then made great wail upon me to deprive out of those quarters before that Eunenes, a professed enemy to Pericles, came to the knowledge thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and doubting what had to find some aid in the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria: and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before. [Thus much of Andronicus his counterfeit Kings son.]

Aurelius the Consul, subdued the Sordians, Fulvius Flaccus was the first man that vanquished in fight the Ligurians beyond the Alps, being sent to aid the Mussiliani against the French Salpes, who lay fore upon the borders of the Mussiliani, and spoiled them. Lucius Optimus the Pretor received under his subjection the Fregellani who had revolted, and destroyed the Town Fregelle. Here he reported a pestilence in Africa, by an exceeding multitude of locusts, killed and lying dead afterwards upon the ground. A survey was taken of the City by the Consuls, wherein were numbered 390736 citizens. C. Gracchus, brother of Tiberius, a Tribune of the Commons, but of the twain more eloquent, preferred certain dangerous laws: and among these, one as touching grain, namely, that the Commons should be served in the market at the rate of one half, and a third part of * Affe, a Modius: another concerning division of lands, the same which his brother before him had published, and a third (whereby he meant to corrupt the order of Gentlemen, which then accorded with the degree of Senators) namely, that from out of the Gentlemen, 600 should be taken into the Senat: and for as much as in those days, there were but 300 Senators, those 600 Gentlemen should be entered into the Senat: that is to say, that the order of Gentlemen should be double in number to the Senators, and twice as strong. This Gracchus having continued his Tribuneship another year, by proposing still the Agrarian laws, prevailed, that many Colonies more should be planted in Italy, and one besides, upon the very plot of ground where Carthage lately destroyed, had stood: and there himself (chose) Triumvir therefore created a Colony. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Q. Metellus against those Balcare Islands, which the Greeks call Gymnetia, because the people go naked all the summer time. But Balcares they are named either of singing darts, or of Balcare the companion of Hercules, whom he left behind there, at what time, as he sailed to Ceryon. Also, the troubles in Syria be here reported, wherein Cleopatra slew both her husband Demetrius and his son Seleucus: taking great indignation, that when his father was by her killed, he without her warrant had taken the diadem upon him.

Caius Sextius the Pro-consul, after he had conquered the nation of the Salpes, built the Colony Aquæ Sextiæ, so called of the plentiful abundance of waters, by reason of springs both hot and cold, and also of his own name. C. Cominius the Pro-consul fought for many years against the * Allobroges, near the Town * Vindiliam. The cause why he levied war against them was, for that they had received and relieved by all means they could, Teutomalus the King of the * Salvi when he fled unto them, and had wasted also the territories of the * Hedunians, who were the allies of the people of Rome. C. Gracchus, after he had born his Tribuneship with much sedition, and kept the Aventine hill with a multitude of the Commons in arms, was by L. Optimus the Consul (who by virtue of an act of Senat had put the people in arms) defeated of his hold and slain; and together with him Fulvius Flaccus a Consular man, his affiance and companion in this furious outrage. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul, and nephew of Paulus, won a field of the Allobroges, and Bituitus King of the Arverni. Of Bituitus his army were slain a hundred and twenty thousand. And when himself in person was gone to Rome to satisfy the Senat, he was committed toward in Alba for that it seemed dangerous and hurtful to the peace, for to send him back again into France. Also there passed a decree, that Congeniatius his son should be apprehended and sent to Rome. The Allobroges submitted and were received, L. Optimus being accused before the body of the people by Q. Decius a Tribune of the Commons, for imprisoning certain citizens uncondemned, was acquit.

Caius Marcus the Consul vanquished the Stoniæ, a people dwelling upon the Alpes, Micipsa, King of the Numidians died, and left the Kingdom unto his three sons, Adherbal, Hymphal, and Jugurtha his brothers son, whom he had adopted for his own child. L. Cælius Metellus subdued the Dalmatians. Jugurtha levied war upon Hymphal his brother, overcame him in fight, and slew him: Adherbal his third brother, he drove out of thereunto, but by the Senat of Rome restored he was again. L. Cælius Metellus, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus the Consuls, deprived 32 Senators of their place and dignity. Besides, this book containeth the troubles of the Syrian Kings.

Of the LXIII. Book.

Caius Porcius the Consul fought with the * Scordisci in Thracia, and lost the field. The Consuls took a survey of the City: in which were enrolled 394336 parts of Roman citizens. Bomyia, Licinia, and Marcia, three vestal virgins were convicted and condemned for incest. The manner how this their fornication was committed, detailed, judged, and punished, is here set down. The * Cimbrians, an huge and mighty nation, invaded Illyricum and put it to the wast: by whom Papirius Carbo the Consul was defeated, both he and his army. Livius Drusus the Consul, warred in Thracia upon the Scordisci, (a people descended from the Gauls) and won much honour.

Of the LXIV. Book.

Adherbal warred upon by Jugurtha, was within the City Cirra besieged, and by him slain, notwithstanding the commandment of the Senat to the contrary. For which cause war was proclaimed against Jugurtha himself. Calphurnius Bestia had the commission and charge to manage this war: who made peace with Jugurtha, without warrant from the people and Senat. Jugurtha being cited and called forth that he had bribed and corrupted with sums of money many of the Senat, came to Rome: where he was in trouble and jeopardy for a murder committed upon the person of a certain Prince, called Maffia (who seeing him to be hated of the Romans, sought for his kingdom) whom he slew at Rome. Being commanded to answer for his life in regard of this murder, he, fiercely fled, and as he departed from the City, uttered (by report) these words, O corrupt City, and yet so vile; how soon wilt thou perish, if it may meet with a chapsman? A. Potthumius a Lieutenant General, after he had likewise sought as unfortunate a battle against Jugurtha, amended the matter full well by making an ignominious and dishonourable peace with him, which the Senat judged no meet to be observed and kept.

Of the LXV. Book.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus the Consul, in two battels discomfited Jugurtha and over-ran all Numidia. M. Jun. Syllanus the Consul, fled unluckily in a battell fought against the Cimbrians: whose cruel demands of the Senat a place of habitation and lands to occupy, were denied. M. Minutius Pro-Cos. had good success in fight against the Thracians. L. Cælius the Consul, together with his host, was defeated and cut in pieces in the borders of the Allobroges by the French Tigrinus, a country of the Helvetians, who had divided themselves and were departed from the rest of the State. The soldiers remaining alive after that overthrow, capitulated with the enemies for safety of their lives, to put in pledge for to part with the one moiety of all that ever they had unto them.

Of the LXVI. Book.

Jugurtha driven out of Numidia by C. Marius, had the help and aid of Bocchus King of the Moors: but when the power of Bocchus also was defeated in battell, and himself unwilling to maintain the war any longer (so unfortunately begun) Jugurtha was overcome, and delivered up to C. Marius. In which exploit the service of L. Cornelius Sylla treasurer unto Marius, was singular above the rest.

Of the LXVII. Book.

Aurelius Scaurus lieutenant to the Consul with his army overthrew by the Cimbrians, and himself taken prisoner. When by them he was called forth to council (at what time as they intended a voyage into Italy) in which he seemed to fright them for passing over the Alps, saying, That the Romans might not possibly be overcome, he was by Bolus their King, a proud and fierce prince, killed. At this time the hands Cn. Manlius C. Serv. capto, Pro-consul received an overthrow in the field and lost both their camp besides 40000. By the verdict and censure of the people of Rome, capto (through whose fault this loss and overthrow happened) was condemned: and he was the first after K. Tarquin whose goal he was a confessor: and finally deprived he was of his government. In the triumph of C. Marius, Jugurtha with his two sons was led before his chariot: and afterwards murdered in prison. Marius entered into the Senat with his triumphant mantle of estate, which never any man before him had done, and for fear of the Cimbrians war he continued in his Magistracy many years together. To his second and third Consulship he was chosen: absent, and he attained to be Consul the fourth time: which heaped upon, after he defied the contrary. C. Domitius was by the suffrages of the people created the chief Pontifex. The Cimbrians having laid waste all the parts about the river Rhodanus and the mountain Pyreneus, passed over into Spain through the streights: where after they had spoiled many places, they were by the Celtiberians chased away: and being returned into France, they joined with the * Teutons, a warlike nation.

Marcus Antonius the Pretor persecuted the robbers at sea, and chased them as far as into Cilicia. C. Manlius the Consul manfully defended at the camp, assailed with all most forcible means by the Teutons and * Ambrones. Afterwards in two battels one after another about * Aquæ Sextiæ he utterly defeated those enemies: where (by report) were slain 20,000 and 90,000 taken prisoners. Marius in his absence was created Consul the fifth time: and when a triumph was offered unto him, he deferred and put it off, until he had made a full and final conquest also of the Cimbrians. The Cimbrians repelled and drove from the Alps Q. Catulus the Pro-consul, who had first the narrow gullet of the Alps, and kept a Castle highly mounted over their Arctetis, which he now abandoned: and when by their valour they had cleared the passage, they passed the Pro-consul with his army, and passed over into Italy together in battell: they were overthrown by the same Catulus and C. Marius, who had joined their forces together: in which (they say) 140,000 men were slain, and 60,000 taken prisoners. Marius was honourably received at his return with a general accord of the whole City: and whereas two triumphs time before had envied him as a man newly start up risen, and advanced to so great honours, confessed now that the common-weal by him was preferred. Publius Metellus for murdering his own mother, was the first man sewed up in a leather bag and so thrown into the sea. Here is recorded how the famous shield Ancilla stirred off themselves with a great rushing noise before the Cimbrians war was finished. Finally this book comprehendeth the war between the two Kings of Syria.

CNEUS APULCIUS SATURNINUS, by the help of C. Marius, and by occasion that A. NONIUS his competitor and concurrent was by his foulness: slain, was by forcible means created Tribune of the commons, and bare the Tribuneship as violently as he got it. And when he had proposed an Agrary law and passed it by force, he moved METELLUS NUMIDICIUS to answer at a day, for that he had not subscribed and sworn to the said law: who being maintained and defended by the Citizens of the better sort, because he would not give no occasion of unseemly debates and evil contentions, went in voluntary exile to Rhodes: and there he employed his time in reading of books, and giving audience to great and famous men. After he was depared, C. Marius the captain and author of that sedition, who now had purchased a sixth Consulship by a large] of money (scamled among] the tribes, proclaimed him as excommunicat and interdicted from fire and water like an outlaw. The same APULCIUS SATURNINUS, Tribune of the commons, flew C. Memmius in his white gown standing to be Cof, for that he feared him above all others to cross his proceeding: whereupon the Senat was exceedingly moved in the cause and behalf of C. Memmius: and when C. Marius a man by nature mutable and in his counsel variable, one who ever loved to be on the better side of the badge and to band with the mightier, was not able to bear him out and protect him, he said SATURNINUS together with GLAUCIA the Prator and other his complices in that outrage, was slain by one RABIRIUS. Q. CECILIUS METELLUS was recalled out of banishment with exceeding great love and favour of the whole City, MANIUS AQUILIUS the Pro-Consul, dispatched and ended the flavet-war raised in Sicily.

When P. Sulpitius a Tribune of the Common, by the advice and instigation of C. Marius had promised certain pernicious laws, that the banished should be restored, and new Citizens together with Libertins be forced into Tribes: also that Marius should be chosen General against Mithridates King of Pontus : and when he offered violence against Q. Pompeius and L. Sylla the Consuls, who contradicted his proceedings : and had slain the son of Pompeius the Consul, who had married Sylla's daughter : then L. Sylla Consul entered Rome with an army, and within the very City fought by against the adverse side of Sulpitius and Marius, and drove them forth : of which faction twelve were by the Senate judged enemies, and amongst them C. Marius both father and son. As for P. Sulpitius, when he was led in a certain farm-house of the country, was betrayed and betrayed by his own bond-servant : and pulled forth from thence and killed. The slave, because he might seem to be rewarded for revealing his Master according to promise, was manumitted and set free : but for his wicked treachery in betraying his own Master he was thrown down the rock Tarpeia. C. Marius the son crossed the seas into Africk, C. Marius the father lay hidden amongst the marshes of the Minnistrans, and was plucked out from thence by the townsmen : and when a certain bondswoman, a Frenchman born, was sent to kill him, she was so frightened at the Majesty and countenance of so brave a man, that she went back and would not do the fearful misdeed : Marius was embarked at the charges of the City and carried into Africk. L. Sylla reformed the State of the City, and drew out from thence inhabitants to people the Colonies. Q. Pompeius the Consul took his journey to receive the army of Cn. Pompeius the Consul, and by his Consul it was slain, Mithridates King of Pontus defeated by Bithynia and Cappadocia : drove out Aquilius the lieutenant, and with a mighty army invaded Phrygia the Province of the people of Rome.

Of the LXXVIII. Book

Mithridates held Asia by his garrisons; he came into prison Q. Oppius the Prae-Consul, and likewise Aquilinus the lieutenant. Also by his commandments, all the Roman Citizens to be found in Asia were in one day massacred. The City Rhodes, which only continued true and kept allegiance, he assailed, but being in certain battles in a year overcome, he razed it down, and made a chief governor and commander under the King, enred Greece with an army, and reduced Athens to slavery. Moreover, this book containeth the fearful trouble of certain Cities and Islands: while the Indians pants endeavour'd to draw their states, some to side with the King; others, to take part with the Romans.

Of the LXXIX. Book.

Lucius Cornelius Cinna, at what time as by force and arms he published dangerous laws, was thereupon by his Collegue Cn. Octavius, driven out of the City with six Tribunes of the commons besides; and being thus deprived of his rule and authority, he became commander of Ap. Claudius his army by corruption; and joining with C. Marius and other banished persons, out of Affrick he march'd in a like manner against the City of Rome. In which war, it fortuned that two brethren, the one of Pompeius his army, and the other of Cinna's, encountered in fight and knew not one another. Now when the conquerour was in disarming, and spoiling him whom he had slain, he saw what he had done, and took knowledge that it was his brother: whereupon he fell into an exceeding piteous fit of weeping and lamentation: made a funeral fire for his brothers corps, stabbed himself through the weapon, and in the same fire was burnt and consumed to ashes. Now whereas these civil wars might have been suppressed in the beginning, such was the fraudulent dealing of Cn. Pompeius, who seeming to maintain both parties, gave strength to Cinna, and set not his helping hand before that the Nobles side went down: such also was the faineness and coldness of the Consul, that Cinna and Marius took heart and grew strong: and so with four armies, whereof two were committed to the conduct of Q. Sertorius and C. Carbo, they invaded the City of Rome. Marius won by force the Colony Ostia, and most gently rancked it.

Of the LXX X. Book.

The Italian nations were by the Senat enfranchised, and obtained the freedom of Rome. The Samnites who only continued in arms banded again with Cinna and Marius. By them was Plancius slain and his army defeated. Cinna and Marius together with Carbo and Sertorius were possessors of Janiculum, and being discomfited and repelled by Octavius the Consul, retired and departed. Marius spoiled and laid desolate Antium, Aricia, and Lavinium three Colonies. When as now the nobility and Lords of the Senat had no hopes at all left to withstand the contrary factions, by reason of the cowardice and treachery as well of soldiers as leaders, who upon corruption either would not fight at all, or else went over to the adverse part: Cinna and Marius were received into Rome: who as if it had been an enemy City forced by assault, made havock of all with massacre and massacres. In this garbail Cn. Octavius the Consul lost his life, and all the nobility of the other side were murdered: and among the rest, M. Antonius a most eloquent Orator, and C. Caesar: whose heads were set upon the Palpi Rostra, Tullius Crassus the son was by the horsemen of Fimbria killed: and Crassus the father, because he would not endure any indignity unworthy his virtues, fell upon his own sword. Without any assembly or election at all, Cinna and C. Marius declared themselves Consuls for the next year: and at the same day where they entered into their Magistracy, Marius caused Sex. Licinius a Senator to be thrown down the rock Tarpeia: and after many wicked and heinous outrages committed upon the Ides of January, he depriv'd out of his world: a man whose vices (if they were weigh'd together with his virtues) hardly could be determin'd whether he were in war a better soldier, or in peace a more dangerous Citizen. For the Commonwealth in his armour saved, the same in his long gown he overthrows first, with all manner of condescension and deceit: and lastly plain hostility and force of arms.

Of the LXX XI. Book.

Lucius Sylla straightly beleaguered Athens, which Archelaus a governour under King Mithridates held with a garrison: and after much toil and labour won it. To the City he granted their liberty again, and restored unto the Citizens all that was their own. Magnesia the only City in Asia that remained free and by all means most valiantly defended against Mithridates. Over and besides, here ye shall read the exploits performed by the Thracians in Macedony.

Of the LXX XII. Book.

Sylla vanquished inattel the power of King Mithridates, which having kept Macedony in obedience, was now come into Thracia. He slew one hundred thousand enemies, and was Master of the Camp. Afterward, when the war was renewed, he discomfited and defeated quite the Kings whole army. Archelaus together with the Kings fleet yielded to Sylla. L. Valerius Flaccus the Consul and companion in government with Cinna, being sent to succed Sylla, was (for his covetousness) so odious unto his army, that he was slain by C. Fimbria his own lieutenant, a most audacious and desperate person: and so the conduct and command of the army was transferr'd to Fimbria. Moreover, here is recorded what Cities in Asia Mithridates won; how cruelly he spoiled and vexed the Province: and how the Thracians made roads and insouglons into Macedony.

Of the LXX XIII. Book.

Caius Fimbria after he had discomfited certain forces of Mithridates won the City Pergamus, besieged the King there, and mistook'd a little of taking him prisoner. To the City Uion, which stood out and refused it self to the behoof and devotion of Sylla, he forced and strove, with the greatest part of Asia he recovered. Sylla in many battels defeated the Thracians. When L. Cinna and C. Papyrius Carbo who for two years together were Consuls of their own making, prepar'd war against Sylla: by the means of L. Valerius Flaccus the President of the Senat (who made an Oration in the Council-house) and those who loved concord and sought for amity, effected it was in the end, that Embassadors should be sent unto Sylla to treat about a peace. Cinna was murdered by his own soldiers, whom he forc'd against their will to be embarked and to take a voyage against Sylla: by which occasion Carbo alone bore the Consulship. Sylla being pass'd over into Asia, made peace with Mithridates upon this capitulation. That the King should quit the Provinces namely Asia, Bithynia, and Cappadocia, Fimbria being forsaken of his own army, which revolted unto Sylla, gave himself a free wound and yielding his neck unto his own bondslave obtained this favour at his hands, as to dispatch him outright.

Of the LXXXIV. Book.

Sylla returned this answer unto the Embassadors sent unto him from the Senat, That he would be Sordered by them, in case those Citizens who (upon the hard usage of Cinna) fled unto him, might be restored. The Senat thought this a reasonable condition and just demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that war would be more commodious unto them, they refused no agreement and accord. The same Carbo when he was minded to exact hostages of all the towns and colonies of Italy, thereby to bind them upon their Allegiance against Sylla, was by a generall consent of the Senat crossed and inhibited. The new embassadors, by virtue of an act by the Senat granted, were allowed the privilege of their passage, and voice. Q. Metellus Pius who had sided with the nobility, whilst he lived was in Affrick, and by C. Fabius the Prator discomfited: and by the fallow of Carbo and those that follow'd the part of Marius, an act of S. was pass'd, That all armies and forces whereforever should be cass'd and discharg'd. The Libertines were distributed indifferently throughout the five and thirty tribes. Besides all this, there was specified the preparation of war which was rais'd against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. Book.

Sylla crossed the sea with an army over into Italy: and when those Embassadors which he sent to treat for peace were by the Consul C. Norbanus coill entreated, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battel. And when he was about to assail the camp of L. Scipio the other Consul, with whom he had travelled and assaid all means to conclude peace, and could not compass it: the whole army of the Consul in generally, being solicited by soldiers whom Sylla had sent out under-hand to take passage, they turned their engines unto him, and followed him standard. Scipio, when he might have been killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius, the son of that Cneus who won Alifum, enrolled in army of vol. stairs, and came unto Sylla with three legions: unto whom also the nobility all and whole winged themselves, so as to surround the City they pass'd to the camp. Finally, in this book report is made of the expeditions performed by Captains of both sides throughout all Italy.

Of the LXXXVI. Book.

That year wherein C. Marius (the son of C. Marius) was by forcible means and strong hand created Consul before he was twenty years of age, C. Fabius in Affrick was burnt quick in his own passion for his bloody cruelty and greedy avarice. L. Philippus, lieutenant unto Sylla, seized Sardinia, after he had discomfited and slain Q. Antonius the Prator. Sylla contracted a league with the States of Italy, to put them out of fear, but he would not because them of their freedom of Rome and liberty of suffrages lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon assured confidence (as he had already) of undoubted victory, he commanded all those that were in suite and resort'd unto him for jurisdiction, to adjudge their appearance in Court, and to appear at Rome. Whilst the City yet was divided and distracted, two men, L. Damalipus the Prator, having according to the will and pleasure of C. Marius the Consul, gathered the Senat together, massacred all the nobility of the City. One of which number Q. Mutius Scævola the great Pontific as he stood was in the very porch and entry of Velants Temple murdered. Besides this book containeth the war renewed by L. Murena against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. Book.

Sylla after he had discomfited and overthrowen the army of C. Marius, near a place called Sacripontus, besieged him within the town Praeneste. The City of Rome he recovered out of the hands of his enemies: and when Marius made an offer to sally forth, he repelled him. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits achieved by his lieutenants, with the like success of both sides in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. Book.

Sylla after that he had defeated and put to the sword the army of Carbo at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, chased him forth of Italy. With the Samnites, who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laid down arms, he fought one small battel, and vanquished them near the City of Rome close by the gate Collina: and thus having recovered and got into his hand the absolute managing of the state, he spoiled and spoil'd this most goodly and beautiful victory with the fittest cruelty that ever man committed. He cut the throats of 8000 in the face of hostility called Villa Publica, even those that had yielded themselves. He set up the tale of proscription and outlawry. The City of Rome and Italy throughout filled with massacre. Amongst these he caused all the Praefectis, disarmed as they were, to be slain. Marius, a Senator by calling, he killed in this manner, by breaking his arms and legs, by cropping his ears, and digging out his eyes. C. Marius besieged within Praeneste by Lucretius Aella and that side with Sylla, when he sought means of evasion by a mine under the ground, seeing how he was overruled by the army, flow himself within the said mine for perceiving that he could not escape, he and Pontius Telesinus, that accompanied him in this fight, saw one at the other with their drawn naked swords: and when he had killed him, and was himself hurt, he found so much kindness at his slaves hands as to make an end of him quite.

Of the LXXXIX. Book.

Lucius Butus sent from Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who was arrived at Corcyra in a slier boat to Lilybaeum, in quest, to see whether Pompey were there: being compass'd, a little benevolent toward him by those vessels which Pompey had sent out toward his sword point to his body, as if the power would allow, Cn. Pompeius sent by the Senat with full commission of rule and command of all Cn. Carbo's power, who was arrived in the 11. day of February, and flew him, who kept a policy and weeped like a woman, when he should see Sylla come Dictator, and that which never any man had done before him: he sent his port abroad with 24. ships or Lictors going before him with their rods and axes. He altered the S. and and in that innovation established it. The Tribunes of the Commons he abridged of their authority, and wholly deprived them of their power to prefer and establish laws. The College of the Pontiffs and Augurs he amplified and augmented to the number of 15. The body of the Senate he supplanted out of the order of Gentlemen. The children of those whom he had proscribed and outlawed he disjunctured for being eligible to any honorable office, and of their goods made portulaks, whereof at first he seized much by violence and laid it away. A mighty mass of money he raised thereof, amounting to a hundred and fifty millions of Sesterces. He commanded Q. Lucretius Ocellus to be killed in the very Forum of Rome for that he presumed without his leave and license to sue for a Consulship: and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignity, he assembled them to a public audience, and before them avowed the fact and took it upon him. Cn. Pompeius in Affrick vanquished and slew in battell Cn. Domitius, one of the proscript outlaws: and Hiarbas King of the Numidians, who prepared to levy war. He being but four and twenty years of age, and no better as yet than a gentleman of Rome (a thing that never any man attained unto) triumphed over Affrick. C. Norbanus, a man who had been Consul, and now proscript and outlawed, was apprehended in the City of Rhodes, and thereupon slew himself. Mutulus likewise one of them that were outlawed and out of protection, being come privily disguised with his head covered to the back door of Bassia his wives house, and with his own hand blindfold sprinkled the door of his wives house. Sylla recovered and won again Nola in Samnium. He brought seven and forty legions into the lands conquered from the enemies, planted them therein, and divided the grounds amongst them. He be sieged the town Volaterra, which yet stood out and bare arms, and at length upon surrender got it. Mitylene also, the only City in Asia (which after that Mithridates was subdued maintained war) was freed and rescued down to the ground.

Of the XC. Book.

Sylla depa'ted this life, and this hence it was done unto him by the Senat, that he was entered in Mars field. M. Lepidus going about to cancel and abolish the acts of Sylla, raised new war: and by Q. Catulus (his companion in government) was driven out of Italy: and when he prepared to wage war (but to no effect) in Sardinia, there he perished, and came to his death. M. Brutus who held Lumbardy, was by Cn. Pompeius slain. Q. Sertorius, another proscript out-law, levied a great war in the northern lands of Spain. Lucius Manlius the Pro-Consul, and M. Domitius a lieutenant, were in fight overcome by Hercules the treasurer. Moreover, this book containeth the acts performed by P. Servilius the Pro-Consul against the Cilicians.

Of the XCI. Book.

Cneus Pompeius, being as yet but a gentleman of Rome, was sent with full commission of Consul, to command against Sertorius. Certain Cities had Sertorius won by assault, and brought under many States to be at his devotion. Ap. Claudius the Pro-Consul overcame the Thracians in divers and many battels. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul defeated and slew L. Hirculeius the treasurer of Sertorius, with all his army.

Of the XCII. Book.

Cneus Pompeius hitherto fought with Sertorius in doubtful event, so as of both parts, one of the wings and points of the battell had the better hand. Q. Sertorius overbore in fight Metellus and Perenna with two armies. Pompeius desirous to carry away his part in that victory, entered into the field, but made no saving game of it. Afterwards Sertorius was besieged within Calagurium, but by daily and continual sallies forth, gave the enemies that lay in siege within as good as they brought. Over and besides, herein are contained the deeds achieved by Curio the Pro-Consul in Thrace against those Dardaniens, together with sundry cruel and bloody parts played by Q. Sertorius, even with those of his own side. For many of his own friends, as such as were with him outlawed, upon imputations of treason pretended against them, he put to death.

Of the XCIII. Book.

Publius Servilius, the Pro-Consul in Cilicia, subdued the Isaurians, and won certain towns of the Priests. Nicomedes King of Bithynia at his death made the people of Rome his full heirs, and his kingdom was reduced into the form of a Province. Mithridates contrived a league with Sertorius, and waged war against the people of Rome. Herein is shewed the great preparation of war that the King made as well by land as sea, and how he seized upon Bithynia. M. Aurelius Cotta the Consul was in battell vanquished by the King at Chalcedon. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Pompeius and Metellus against Sertorius, who in all warlike feats and martial prowess was equal unto them, whom also he saved from the siege before the town Calagurium, and compelled to go into divers countries, Pompeius into the further Province of Spain, and Pompeius into Gallia.

Of the XCIII. Book.

Lucius Lucullus the Consul fought against Mithridates, and in horse-service had the better hand of him. Certain roads he made with good success, and when his soldiers called hard upon him for battell, he fled them from mutiny. Deiotarus a tyrant of Gallogracia, defeated the captains of X. Mithridates who led war in Phrygia. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate achievements of Pompeius against Sertorius in Spain.

Of the XCV. Book.

Ains Curio the Pro-Consul vanquished and subdued the Dardaniens in Thrace. Threescore and fourteen sword-players of Capua fled out of the fest-school of Lentulus at Capua: who having gathered together a number of slaves, and hired hind, raised war under the leading of Chrysius and Spartacus, tacus, and vanquished in plain field, Cl. Pulcher a lieutenant, and P. Vatinius the Prator. L. Lucullus the Pro-Consul with the famine and the sword together tamed and subdued the host of Mithridates at the City Cizicus: and when they had chased him out of Bithynia, after many overthrow in war, and misfortunes of shipwreck at sea, wherewith his heart was qualified, he compelled him to flee into Pontus.

Of the XCVI. Book.

Quintus Arrius the Prator defeated and slew Chrysius the captain of the fugitives, and with him 20000 men. Ains Lentulus the Consul recovered a spoil and overthrow at the hands of Spartacus. He also overcame in fight Lu. Gellius the Consul and Quintus Arrius. Sertorius was at a battell slain by Manius Antonius and M. Perenna with other conspirators in the eight year of his disband. A captain and brave warrior he was. He fought with Pompeius and Metellus, two famous Generals and Commanders. Many a time he saved his own, but more often went away winner, however, in the end he was abandoned and betrayed. The overthrow of that side was made over to Marcus Perenna. Whom Cn. Pompeius vanquished, took prisoner, and slew: so about the tenth year after the war began, he recovered Spain. C. Cassius the Pro-Consul, and Cneus Manlius the Prator were killed by Spartacus in the field, and that war was committed over to the managing and conduct of M. Crassus the Prator.

Of the XCVII. Book.

Marcus Crassus the Prator first fought with a power of the fugitives afore said, consisting of Frenchmen and Germans, and won the better: for he slew 35000 enemies, and their captain Granicus. After that the warred against Spartacus, killed him also and 40000 with him. Manius Antonius the Prator maintained war unfortunately against the Cretensians, and by his death it took an end. M. Lucullus the Pro-Consul brought the Thracians under subjection. L. Lucullus had the upper hand in a battell of Mithridates in Pontus, and slew above 60000 enemies. M. Crassus and Cn. Pompeius were created Consuls, and as Crassus immediately out of his Pratorship stepped to that dignity, so Pompey was of a gentleman of Rome and no better advanced thereunto, even before he had won the office of Treasurer. They restored again the Tribunes power and authority. By the means of Aurelius Cotta the preeminence of judgements also was translated unto the Gentlemen of Rome. Mithridates seeing his own estate lying in danger, fled unto Tigranes King of Armenia for succour.

Of the XCVIII. Book.

Machares the son of Mithridates, King of Bosphorus, was by L. Lucullus received into amity. Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius the Consuls administered their office with great severity and rigour, and disposed 60 from Senators dignity: they also held a review and purged the City. Enrolled there were 450000 Citizens of Rome. L. Metellus Lord Prator in Sicily fought furiously against the private reivers, the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, which by fire had been consumed, was re-edified by Q. Catulus, and dedicated anew. L. Lucullus in Armenia discomfited in many battels Mithridates and Tigranes with a mighty power of both Kings. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul having the charge of the war against the Candots, besieged the City Cydonia. C. Triarius a lieutenant under Lucullus recovered a battell of Mithridates in fight. Lucullus was impeached, and stand for pursuing Mithridates and Tigranes, that he could not accomplish his victory by occasion of a mutiny among his own soldiers, who would not follow, because the Valerian Legions forsook Lucullus, alleging that they had served their time fully out.

Of the XCIX. Book.

Quintus Metellus the Pro-Consul forced by assault Gnosus, Lyctus, Cydonia, and many other Cities in Crete. L. Roscius a Trib. of the Com. pulled a Law, that the gentlemen of Rome should be allowed the 14 next seats in the scaffold of the Theatre, to behold the games and plaies. Cn. Pompeius being commanded by a law promulged unto the people for to pursue the reivers above said, who had debarr'd and cut off all commerce for corn and vitall, within 74 dies rid the sea of them quite, and after the war with them finished in Cilicia, he received them upon submission, and gave them Cities and lands to possess. Moreover, this book containeth the worthy exploits of Q. Metellus against the Cretensians. The letters also of Metellus and Cn. Pompeius, sent from the one to the other: in which Metellus complaineth that Pompeius by sending his own lieutenant into Crete, to receive the surrender and homage of the Cities there, annulled and p'ssided by the glory of those acts which he had achieved. Pompeius again answereth a reason thereof, and alledgeth that so he ought to do.

Of the C. Book.

Ains Manilius a Trib. of the Com. preferred a bill, to the exceeding displeasure and indignation of the nobles, that the war against Mithridates should be assigned to Pompey. His speech to the people imported and was effectual. Q. Metellus having subdued the Cretensians, gave laws unto that Island, which until that time enjoyed freedom of State. Cn. Pompeius won his honour for to levy war against Mithridates, and with Phraates, King of the Parthians, he renewed the league. In a battell performed by both, he overcame Mithridates. Also herein is contained the war, first between Phraates King of the Parthians, and Tigranes King of the Armenians: afterwards between Tigranes the son and his father.

Of the CI. Book.

Cneus Pompeius vanquished Mithridates in a battell fought by night, and compelled him to flee to Bosphorus. He received Tigranes upon his submission and when he had taken from him Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia, he gave him again the kingdom of Armenia. Their conspiracy who having been condemned for the inordinant and ambitious sins of the Consulship, were considered to kill the Consul, was surprised and dashed. Cn. Pompeius following the chase after Mithridates, saved into far remote countries and unknown nations. The Iberians and Albanians who would not grant him passage, he overcame in battell. Over and besides this book sheweth how Mithridates fled by Colchii and Heniochi, and what his acts were in Bosphorus.

Of the CII. Book.

Cn. Pompeius reduced the realm of Pontus into the form of a Province. Pharnaces the son of Mithridates made war upon his own fathers, by whom Mithridates was besieged within his own royall Court and Palace. Whereupon he drank poison and seeing it was not effectfull and strong enough to dispatch him, he was killed by a French souldier, named Biturix, whose helping hand he requested for to rid him out of the world. Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews: their famous Temple of Jerusalem, which until that day never had suffered abuse and violence, beset and won. Catiline, by occasions that he had twice suffered a repulse in suing to be Consul, conspired together with Lentulus the Prator, Cethegus, and many others, to massacre the Consuls and the Senat, to set the City on fire, and to subvert and overthrow the State of the Common-wealth, and to this purpose had levied an army in Tuicany. This treason and conspiracy was by the industry of M. Tullius Cicero detected and found out. Catiline was banished the City. The rest of his complots and adherents every one suffered death accordingly.

Of the CIII. Book.

Catiline together with his army, was by C. Antonius the Pro-Consul defeated and slain. P. Clodius was accus'd for entring (in the habit and apparel of a woman) into a Chappel which it was not lawful for a man to go into, and notwithstanding he had committed adultery with the arch-priestess wife, yet he was acquit and went clear away. Cn. Pompeius the Prator published with great strife and contention, the Senat was unwilling thereto; but by the other Cef. M. Bibulus they passed. C. Antonius, Pro-Consul in Thracia, shed his badly in his war-affairs. M. Cicero was banished the City by over-tonius. P. Clodius Tribune of the Commons, for that he had put to death certain Roman Citizens uncondemned, Caesar made a voyage into the Province of Gaul, where he subdued the Helvetians, a vagrant and wandering nation in those dates, who seeking a place to inhabit, intended through the Province of Cesar to travell into * Narbo. Moreover, it containeth the situation of France. Pompeius triumphed over the children of Mithridates, also over Tigranes and his son, and by one voice and generall consent of the whole assembly was saluted by the name of * Magnus.

Of the CIV. Book.

The forepart of this book compriseth the sit and description, together with the manners of Germany. C. Cesar at what time as he led his army against the Germans, at the request of the Helvians and Segvianians, whose territory by them was possessed, and who under the conduct of Ariovitus were come down into France, by an Oration to his army shaid the timorous disposition of the souldiers, which arose upon the fear they had of new and strange enemies, vanquished the Germans in plain fight, and drove them clean out of France. M. Cicero by means of Pompeius (who among others made an Oration in his behalf) and of T. Annius Milo, a Tribune of the Commons, who likewise pleaded his cause, was with the exceeding joy of the Senat and all Italy called home from exile. Cn. Pompeius had commision for five year space to look unto the provision of corn and vittuals, Cesar overcame in fight the Ambians, Sussians, Proandians, Atrebares (nations all of the Belgæ) of whom there was an exceeding multitude, and received them upon yielding to his protection. Afterwards he fought with passing great hazard and jeopardy against the Nervii, one of his foresaid States, and in five utterly destroyed and extinguished their whole generation: for they had waged war so long, untill of 60000 armed men there remained but 300, and of 95 of their Noblemen three only escaped and no more. There passed a law for to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Province, and to confiscate the King's treasure: by overtune whereof, the managing of that affair was committed to C. Cato, Ptolemaus King of Egypt suffered many wrongs and injuries at his own subjects hands, and being by them expelled out of his kingdom, came to Rome. C. Cesar in a battell at sea vanquished the Venetians, a State and City seated in the very Ocean. Last of all, it reporteth exploits by his Lieutenants performed with like good fortune.

Of

Of the CV. Book.

At what time as the assembly for election of Magistrates might be holden, by reason of the negatives and inhibitions of C. Cato a Trib. of the Com, the Senat generally in token of sorrow put on mourning weeds. M. Cato in his sute for a Pratorship suffered a repulse, and Vatinius was preferred before him. The same Vatinius when he would have impeached the law, whereby were granted to the Consuls the Provinces for five years, unto Pompey the government of both Spains, unto Crassus Syria and the Parthian war, and unto Cesar France and Germany, was by C. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, and the first maker of the said law, committed to prison. M. Gabinius the Pro-Consul established Ptolemaus again in the kingdom of Egypt, and dispossessed Archelaus whom they had set up for their King. Cesar after he had vanquished and put to sword the Germans in France, crossed over the Rhene, and subdued that part of Germany which is next thereto: which done, he sailed over into Brittain with much trouble and damages, by reason of the cross and contrary winds whilst he was at sea; and he sped little better when he was there: but after he had slain a mighty great number of men, he brought into subjection the rest of the Island.

Of the CVI. Book.

Iulia daughter to Cesar and wife to Pompeius departed this life, and had this surpassing honour done unto her by the people, as to be enterr'd in Mars field. Many of the States of France revolted by the leading of Ambiorix, Duke of the Eburons, by whom Cotta and T. Aurunculeius the Lieutenants of Cesar, were by an ambuscado surprised and environed, and by means thereof they and the armies whereof they had the conduct were put to the sword. And at what time as the camp of the other legions also was besieged, assailed, and with difficulty defended, and among them Q. Cicero, who was Lord President of the Treveri: the enemies were by Cesar himself in person overtaken in fight. M. Crassus intending to war upon the Parthians posted over the river Euphrates, and being vanquished in battell, wherein his son was slain, after he had rallied the broken end of his army, and retired them to a little hill, he was trained forth by the enemies (whose Captain was Surenas) to a parley and treaty of peace, and thereupon attacked: but because he would not suffer any indignity and villany alive, he made resistance and in that struggling of his was slain, and there an end of him.

Of the CVII. Book.

Caius Cesar having vanquished the Treveri in Gaul, passed over the second time into Germany, but finding no enemy there to make head, returned into France, where the Eburons and other Gentles which had conspired, he overcame, put their King Ambiorix to flight, and followed him in chase. The body of P. Clodius slain in the big way Appia near Bovilla by T. Annius Milo a competitor of the Consulship, the Commons of Rome burnt in a funeral fire within the Curia Hostilia. By occasion of a tedious variance between two Candidates for a Consulship, namely, Hypiclus Scipio, and Milo, who with force and arms tried the issue by the ears: Cn. Pompeius was sent out of the Senat to suppress such enormous debates. Created Consul he was the third time in his absence, and (which prerogative no man ever had) alone without Collegue. A commission was granted forth to sit upon the death of Pub. Clodius, by vertue whereof Milo was judicially condemned, and had his judgment to be banished. A bill was proposed, that C. Cesar notwithstanding he was absent, should be accepted of in the election of Consuls, albeit M. Cato was unwilling thereto, and gainst it. Moreover, this book containeth the warlike act: achieved by C. Cesar against the Gauls (who generally in manner revolted under the leading of Vercingetorix the Avernian: also the painfull sieges of certain Cities, and namely, of * Avaricum in Bituriges, and * Gergovia in Auvergne.

* Biterges.
* In Brit.
* C. 1003.

Of the CVIII. Book.

Caius Cesar vanquished the Gauls at * Alexia, and received all the Cities in France which had been in arms, into his protection upon their submission. C. Cassius the treasurer of M. Crassus, put the Parthians to the sword, who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato sued to be Consul, and had the repulse, and Ser. Sulpitius with M. Marcellus were created Consuls: C. Cesar subdued the * Bellovacii, with other States and Cities in France. Also it containeth the strife and debate between the Consuls about sending of a successor to C. Cesar. For M. Marcellus the Consul was earnest in the Senat, that Cesar should come to stand for a Consulship, considering that he by a law made in that behalf was to govern his provinces unto that time of his Consulship. Last of all, the martiall deeds of Mar. Bibulus in Syria are here reported.

Of the CIX. Book.

The causes of the civilwar and their beginnings be here set down. The contentions likewise about a successor to be sent in lieu of Cesar, who denied flatly to dismiss the armies, until Pompey also discharged charged his forces. At once, this book treats of the actions preferred by C. Cato, a Tribune of the Commons, first against Cæsar, and afterwards for him. When there passed an act of the Senate, that one or other without fail should be employed to succeed Cæsar, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, two other Tribunes (for that by their negative and inhibitions they seemed to cross and stay that act) were expelled the City; and a commission was directed by the Senate to the Consuls, and to Cn. Pompeius, in this form, To see that the Common-wealth sustained no damage. C. Cæsar intending to persecute his adversary, came with his army into Italy. Cornificius together with L. Domitius and L. Lentulus he took prisoners, and let them go again: but Cn. Pompeius, and the rest of that side he miserably chased forth of Italy.

Of the CX. Book.

Cæsar besieged Massilia, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C. Trebonius and D. Brutus at the siege, took a journey into Spain, where he received upon submission Lu. Afranius and C. Petreius, two lieutenants of Pompeius, with seven legions at Ilberda, and dismissed them all with no harm done unto them. Vatro also a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his army came under his obedience. The Gaditani he enfranchised and gave the City unto. The Massilians after two overthrow in sea-fights, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Cæsar. C. Antonius a lieutenant of Cæsar, fought an unfortunate battle against the Pompeians, and in Illyricum was taken prisoner: during which war, the inhabitants of Opitergium, beyond the river of Padus (who were the auxiliaries of Cæsar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and lighters locked up and fast shut within the enemies ships, rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one. C. Curio, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Affric, after he had fought against Varus a captain of the Pompeians, was together with his army defeated, and was in power by Juba King of Mauritania. C. Cæsar passed the sea over into Greece.

Of the CXI. Book.

Cæsar Cæcilius Rufus the Prator going about to raise commotions and seditions all that over he could within the City, and having solicited the commons upon the hope of cancelling all debt-books, was first deposed from his Magistracy, and after driven out of the City. Then he banded with Milo a banished person, who had levied a power of fugitive outlaws: but both of them in this preparation of war came short of their purpose and were slain. Cleopatra queen of Egypt was by her brother Ptolemæus expelled out of her kingdom. By reason of the avarice and cruelty of Q. Cæcilius the Prator, the Cordubians in Spain, together with two Varian legions, revolted from Cæsar and his side. Cn. Pompeius was besieged by Cæsar at Brundisium: but having won his sconces with the guards thereto belonging, and that with great loss of the adverse party, he was delivered from the siege. But after the war was translated into Thessaly, he was at Pharsalia in a battle overthrow. There remained still within the camp Cicero, a man by nature framed for nothing more unfit than war. Cæsar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victory submitted themselves to his mercy.

Of the CXII. Book.

Herein is related the fearful condition of that side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundry parts of the world. Cn. Pompeius being arrived in Egypt, by the commandment of Ptolemæus the King as yet an infant under age, and persuasion of Theodorus his teacher and schoolmaster, who might of all other over-rule the King, was killed by the hands of Achilla, one who had a warrant to execute that feat, even in the very barge before he was landed. But Cornelia his wife, and Sextus Pompeius his son fled back into cyprus. Cæsar three daies after the foresaid victory, pursued Pompeius: and when Theodorus presented unto him his hand and signet of his finger, he was distressed in his heart and wept withall. He entered Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and hurlyburly therein. Cæsar was created Dictator. He restored Cleopatra unto the kingdom of Egypt: and when Ptolemæus made war by their advice and counsell who moved him to murder Pompeius, Cæsar vanquished him, with great peril and hazard of himself. As Ptolemæus fled, his vessel wherein he was embarked ran a ground in Nilus, and there stuck fast. Besides, this book sheweth the painful and toilsome journey of Marcus Cato with his legions in Affric through the desert wilderness: and the war which Cn. Domitius fortunately managed against Phraates the Parthian King.

Of the CXIII. Book.

When the side of Pompeius had gathered heart and strength in Affric, the sovereign command thereof was committed to P. Scipio: for Mato who before had equal power and commission with him, gave place and yielded his right. Now when it was debated in council as touching the subverting and utter ruin of Utica, for that the City was so inclined and favourable to Cæsar, while M. Cato stood stiffly in this point, that it should not be destroyed, and Juba the King earnestly to have it saved: the guard and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. The son of Pompey the great, having levied forces in Spain (the conduct and leading whereof, neither Afranius nor Petreius were willing to undertake), made fresh war upon Cæsar, Pharnaces King of Pontus and son of Mithridates, endured no time of war.

but was soon overcome. At what time as P. Dolabella a Tribune of the com, raised seditions in Rome, by means of a law by him published in the behalf of bankrupts. That the old debts should be stricken off, and new order taken with the creditors: upon which occasion there ensued a commotion of the commons. M. Antonius, General of the Cavalry, entered the City with a strength of soldiers: and eight hundred of the commons lost their lives. Cæsar discharged all his old soldiers, who in a mutiny demanded the same: and having sailed into Affric, he fought against the power of K. Juba with exceeding great jeopardy.

Of the CXIV. Book.

Cæcilius Bassus a gentleman of Rome, and one of Pompeys side, levied war in Syria. Sextus Cæsar was both for saken by the legion which revolted and went to Bassus, and also slain. Cæsar vanquished Scipio the Prator, Afranius, and Juba, near Tapio, and forced their camp. Cato hearing thereof, wounded himself at Utica: and when his son came between and bled his hand, his hurt was dressed, but in the very cure, as the wound was newly lanced again, he yielded up his vitall breath and died, in the 49 year of his age. Petreius killed Juba and himself. P. Scipio in his ship was by sea round, and at his death, which he took manfully, he uttered a brave speech: for when the enemies made search and enquiry what was become of the General, The General (quoth he) well, Paulus and Afranius were slain. Cato's son had his pardon. Brutus, a lieutenant of Cæsar vanquished the Bellocians in France that rebelled.

Of the CXV. Book.

Cæsar rode in four triumphs over France, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. A solemn feast he made, and exhibited unto the people shows of all sorts. Into M. Marcellus a man of Consular dignity, at the request of the Senate he granted leave to returne with Marcellus, could not enjoy the benefit of this grace and favour, by reason that he was murdered at Athens by Cn. Magius Chilo, his own client and vaillal. Cæsar also held a review of the City, wherein were enrolled 150000 Citizens, whereas before there had been numbered 400000. See the calamity of civil war. He took a voyage into Spain against Sex. Pompeius: and after many rodes and expeditions on both sides made, and some cities forced, in the end he attained one final victory for all before the City Munda, but with exceeding peril and danger. Sex. Sempronius escaped and fled.

Of the CXVI. Book.

Cæsar triumphed a fifth time over Spain. When many honours and those right excellent, were by the Senat ordained for him, and namely, among the rest, to be called Pater Patriæ: it to be sacrosanct and inviolable: and withall to be Dictator for ever: he gave occasion to be envied and misliked: first in that when the Senat bestowed upon him these honourable titles, at what time as he sat before the Temple of Venus Genetrix, he rose not up nor did reverence unto them: second for that when Mar. Antonius the Consul and his Colleague ran among the Luperci, he laid upon his ivory chair of estate the wreath or diadem which was by him set upon his head: thirdly, because he deprived from their authority Epitius Marullus and Cæcilius Flavius, two Tribunes of the Commons, who went about to bring him into hatred, as if he affected and sought to be King. Upon these causes, a conspiracy was contrived against him, whereby the principall heads, were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, and C. Cassius, also one of his own side D. Brutus: by whom he was massacred in the court of Pompeius, and received 23 wounds: and by these murderers was the Capitol seized and held. But after that the Senat had passed a decree to forget this murder, as conspirators aforesaid, having received for their security the favour of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, came down from the Capitol. By the last will and testament of Cæsar, C. Octavius (his sisters son) was made his half heir, and adopted into his own name. The body of Cæsar being brought into Mars field, was by the Com. burnt in a funeral fire before the Rostra. The honour and dignity of Dictatorship was for ever abolished. Chameaces a person of most vile and base condition, avowed himself to be the son of C. Marius: and whilst he raised a sedition among the credulous common people, was cut off and killed.

Of the CXVII. Book.

Cæsar Octavius from out of Epirus repaired to Rome: for Cæsar had sent him thither before, when he minded to make war in Macedony, where he was received with good tokens and fortunate preface, and withall took upon him the name of Cæsar. In this confusion of state and tumultuous trouble of all things, Lepidus attained by stealth to the highest pontifical dignity. But when M. Antonius the Consul demeaned himself most lordly and proudly in his place, and by force published a law at touching the exchange of the Provinces; and withal offered much wrong and abuse to Cæsar, when he made request that he would assist and stand with him in revenge of those that murdered his uncle: Cæsar, to the end that he might make both himself and the commons freed from against him, raised and excited the old soldiers whom he had before placed in Colonies. The fourth legion also, and that called Marcia, fell from Antonius and turned their engines to Cæsar. After this more tedious (by occasion that many through the cruelty of A. Antonius were murdered every where in their tents) because they were once suspected, revolted from him and ranged to Cæsar. D. Brutus purposing to stop Antonius as he should pass into Lombardy, seized upon Mutina with an army. Finally, this book declares the running to and fro of those on both parts, so be possessed first of the Provinces, and the preparation for war.

Of the CXVIII, Book.

MARCUS BRUTUS in Greece (under a pretence of maintaining the state, and enterprising war against Antonius) possessed himself of the army whereof VETURIUS had the conduct together with the Province. Unto CÆSAR, who first took arms in defence of the C. P. the government and command of a Province was granted, with the Prætorian ornaments and ensigns thereto belonging, and withall, he had this addition to be reputed 'Pro-Prætor.' M. ANTONIUS besieged D. BRUTUS in MUTINA. Certain Embassadors were sent unto him from the Senat as concerning peace, but little availed they in the treaty and conclusion thereof. The people of Rome generally betook them to arms and soldiers habit. BRUTUS in EPIRUS subdued C. ANTONIUS the Prætor together with his army.

Of the CXIX, Book.

CNEUS TREBONIUS was by the guilfull practice of P. DOLABELLA, slain in Asia: for which fall DOLABELLA was by the Senat judged an enemy to the State. When PANIA the Cof. was at the point to lose the field, ANTONIUS, A. HIRTIIUS the other Cof. came with his army to the rescue, discomfited the forces of M. ANTONIUS, and so made the fortune of both parts alike and equall. Afterwards, ANTONIUS being vanquished by HIRTIIUS and CÆSAR, fled into FRANCE, and joyned unto him M. LEPIDUS with the legions which were in der him. Both he and all they who were within his holds in garrison, were by the Senat attainted. ANIUS HIRTIIUS, who after his victory was slain within the camp of the enemies, and L. PANIA, who died of a wound received in an unfortunate fight, were both buried in Mars field. To C. CÆSAR the only Captain of the three now remaining alive, the Senat was not so kind as they ought to have been: for having ordered that D. BRUTUS (who by CÆSAR had been delivered from the siege at MUTINA) should triumph, they made no thankfull remembrance of CÆSAR and his soldiers, as was meet and requisite. For which discontentes, C. CÆSAR (being reconciled to M. ANTONIUS by the means and mediation of M. LEPIDUS) came to Rome with an army: and when they were sore dismaied at his coming, who had before increased him so unkindly, created Consul he was (with Q. P. P. being but nineteen years of age, or not full twenty, for he wanted one day, as Velleius Paterculus saith).

Of the CXX, Book.

CÆSAR now Consul, proposed a law for an inquisition to be made of them by whose means his father CÆSAR was killed. And by virtue of that law, M. BRUTUS, C. CASSIUS, and D. BRUTUS were indicted, attainted and condemned in their absence. When together with M. ANTONIUS, ANINIUS POLLIO also, and M. NATIVUS PLANCUS had joyned their arms, and thereby much strengthened and augmented their forces, D. BRUTUS whom the Senat had sent with commission to pursue ANTONIUS, being now forlorn of his own legions and fled, was at the commandment of ANTONIUS (into whose hands he fell) killed by one CAPEBUS a Burgonian. Caius CÆSAR contraited a peace with ANTONIUS and LEPIDUS, wherein it was capitulated between them, that those three should for five years have the sovereignty over all, only to set in order and establish the state of the common-weal: to wit, himself, LEPIDUS, and ANTONIUS, and each of them proscribed, and outlaw their own adversaries and enemies, in which proscription were contained the names of very many Gentlemen of Rome, and one hundred and thirty Senators, and amongst the rest, were L. PALLIUS the brother of M. LEPIDUS, L. CÆSAR the uncle of ANTONIUS by the Mother, and M. CICERO, slain by POPILIUS a gionary soldier, in the 63 year of his age, whose head and hands was set upon the Rostra. Moreover, this book sheweth the deeds by M. BRUTUS achieved in Greece.

Of the CXXI, Book.

CASSIUS who had in commission from the Senat, to pursue by force of arms DOLABELLA, judged an enemy to the common-weal, being born out by the authority and warrant of the State, possessed himself of SYRIA, and became Master of three armies which were in that Province. He besieged DOLABELLA within the City of LAODICEA, and put him to death. C. ANTONIUS was likewise taken prisoner, and by commandment from M. BRUTUS slain.

Of the CXXII, Book.

MARCUS BRUTUS had but bad success in fight against the Thracians. After that all the Provinces beyond sea, and the armies, were under his hands and Caius CASSIUS: they comploted both together at SYRINA, what course to take for the future war. Publicola the brother of M. MESSALA they vanquished, and yet by common consent they pardoned him.

Of the CXXIII, Book.

SEXTUS POMPEIUS the son of MAGNUS, assembled together out of EPIRUS a number of outlaws and banished persons, and having a long time with this army robbed only by way of piracy, and settled as yet upon the possession of no piece upon the land, first seized MESSANA, a town in Sicily, and afterwards the

the whole Province. And after that A. POMPEIUS Bithynicus the Prætor there, was by Pompey slain: he the said Pompey in a battell at sea vanquished Q. SALVIDIENUS, a Lieutenant of CÆSAR. CÆSAR and ANTONIUS with their armies sailed over into Greece, with intent to wage war against BRUTUS and CASSIUS. QUINTIUS CORNICIUS in AFFRICK overcame in plain fight T. SEPTIUS, the Captain of the Cassian faction.

Of the CXXIII, Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR together with ANTONY fought at PHILIPPI with variable fortune against BRUTUS and CASSIUS, in such sort, as the right point of both battels last he better, and each of them won the other camp. But the death of CASSIUS was it that turned the balance and made the difference: who being in that point that retreated and went down, supposed that the whole army and withall was discomfited and so killed himself. In another conflict afterwards, M. BRUTUS also was overcome, and there ended his life: for he intreated STRATO (that accompanied him in his flight) to set his sword point toward him, and so he was upon it. The same did some forty more of the principall Romans: among whom was Q. HORTENSIVS likewise slain.

Of the CXXV, Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR left ANTONY (for to his share fell the Empire of some Provinces beyond sea) and returned into Italy. He divided lands among his old soldiers. The mutinies of his own army by occasion that the soldiers were seduced by FULVIA the wife of M. ANTONIUS and rose against their Generall, he repressed with exceeding danger and jeopardy: L. ANTONIUS the Cof. and brother to M. ANTONIUS, the ungracious counsel and persuasion of the said FULVIA, made war upon CÆSAR: and having procured the actions to side and take part with him, whose lands had been made over and assigned to the old soldiers afore said, and withall, discomfited M. LEPIDUS, who with an army had the government and guard of the City, entered perforce by way of hostility into Rome.

Of the CXXVI, Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR when he was but three and twenty years of age, besieged L. ANTONIUS in the town PERUSIA: and when he made sundry offers to fully out and break forth, he repelled and chased him back, yea, and for very hunger forced him to yield and come under his obedience. As for ANTONY himself and all his soldiers, he pardoned, but PERUSIA he rased and destroyed. Finally, after he had brought all the armies of the adverse side to submit and to stand to his mercy, he finished the war without effusion of any blood.

Of the CXXVII, Book.

THE PARTHIANS, under the conduct of LABIENUS, who had taken part with POMPEY and that side, invaded SYRIA: overcome DIDIVS SASS, the Lieutenant of M. ANTONIUS, and held all that Province to their own use. M. ANTONIUS being solicited by the instigation of his wife FULVIA to make war against CÆSAR, put her away, because she should be no let nor hindrance to the accord and agreement of the three rulers in their Triumvirat. Then made he a peace with CÆSAR, and took to wife his sister OCTAVIA. Q. SALVIDIENUS who complotted mischief against CÆSAR, he detested and bewaried: who being thereupon condemned, wrought his own death. P. VENTIDIUS a Lieutenant under ANTONIUS, overcome the PARTHIANS in battell, and chased them forth of SYRIA, having before slain their Leader LABIENUS. When at SEXTUS POMPEIUS held SICILY, and being a near enemy and neighbour to Italy, staid at her transporting of corn and victuals by sea: upon request CÆSAR and ANTONY made peace with him for this consideration, that he should govern SICILY as his Province. Also herein are set forth the troubles and wars of AFFRICK.

Of the CXXVIII, Book.

WHEN SEXTUS POMPEIUS infested the sea again with robbery and piracy, and would not make good and maintain that peace, which he had accepted of CÆSAR, he was forced upon necessity to undertake war against him, and in two naval battels fought with double event. L. VENTIDIUS a Lieutenant of M. ANTONIUS, vanquished the PARTHIANS in SYRIA and slew their King. The Jews also were by ANTONIUS Lieutenant subdued. Herein besides, is set forth the preparation for this consideration, that he should govern SICILY as his Province. Also herein are set forth the troubles and wars of AFFRICK.

Of the CXXIX, Book.

SUNDRY battels were fought at sea against SEXTUS POMPEIUS with variable issue: so as, of CÆSARS two fleets, the one which was conducted by AGRIPPA, got the better hand: but the other led by CÆSAR himself, had the overbrow: and the soldiers being set ashore were in exceeding great danger. But afterwards POMPEIUS was defeated, and thereupon fled into SICILY. MARCUS LEPIDUS crossed the sea from out of AFFRICK, pretending to take part with CÆSAR in his wars to be made against SEXTUS POMPEIUS. But when CÆSAR warred upon him also, he was abandoned of his army, and being content to resign up the honour and dignity of the Triumvirat, obtained life. M. AGRIPPA was by CÆSAR rewarded with a naval crown, an honour to no man ever granted before him.

Of the CXXX, Book.

Marcus Antonius, in his rioting time with Cleopatra, entered into the Province of Media with eighteen legions, and sixteen thousand horsemen; levied war upon the Parthians, and when he had left two of his legions, seeing nothing prosper well on his side, he retired back. But still the Parthians followed him in chase; whereupon in exceeding fearful battle and great perill of the whole army, he returned into Armenia: so as in 27 daies he fled three hundred miles. About 8000 men he lost by tempestuous weather, but he was himself the occasion that he suffered these dangerous tempests, over and besides the Parthian war which unfortunately he entered, because he would not winter in Armenia for haste he made to his love Cleopatra.

Of the CXXXI, Book.

Sex Pompeius having once submitted, whilse he was in the protection of M. Antonius, went about to stir war against him in Asia; but by his Lieutenant he was surprised and slain. Caesar fled the mutiny of the old soldiers, which with great mischief was begun: he subdued the Ispides, the Dalmatians, and Pannonians, Antonius having upon his word and promise of safety and protection, constrained unto him Artavasdes the King of Armenia, commanded him to be led up safe in front, and gave the kingdom of Armenia to his own son, which he had by Cleopatra; for now by this time he began to avow her as his wife, upon whom long before he was enamoured and doted in love.

Of the CXXXII, Book.

Caius Caesar subdued the Dalmatians in Illyricum, when M. Antonius for the love of Cleopatra (who bore him two sons, Philadelphus and Alexander) would neither return to the City of Rome, nor after the time of the Triumvirate expired, resign up that dignity and government; but prepared for war, which he meant to levy against Rome and Italy: and thereto he raised a mighty power, as well of sea forces as land: and withall, had renounced the marriage with Octavia, Caesar's sister, and sent her a letter of divorcement, and so put her away: Caesar thereupon with an army sailed into Epirus. The battles, sieges, skirmishes, and the horse-fights, wherein Caesar had the upper hand, be here related.

Of the CXXXIII, Book.

Marcus Antonius was with his fleet overcome at Actium, and thereupon fled to Alexandria: where being by Caesar besieged, and in despair of recovering his former state, but moved especially upon this consideration that was spread, how Cleopatra was killed, he slew himself. When Caesar was now Master of Alexandria, Cleopatra likewise because she would not fall into the hands of the conqueror, willingly procured her own death. Caesar upon his return to the City of Rome, had the honour of a triumph; the one over Illyricum, another for the victory at Actium, and the third in regard of Cleopatra. Thus when he had finished all civil wars which had continued 21 years, M. Lepidus, the son of Lepidus the Triumvir, confessed a gift Caesar: and whilse he went about to make war, was prevented and slain.

Of the CXXXIV, Book.

Caius Caesar having set the State in good order, and reduced all Provinces into one certain form, was surnamed also Augustus: and the month Sextilis to honour his name was likewise so called. Whilse he sat in exaltation at Narbonne, he took a review of the three Provinces of Gaul, which his father (Caesar) had conquered. The war which M. Crassus made against the Bastarnians, Massians, and other nations, is here reported.

Of the CXXXV, Book.

The war which M. Crassus levied against the Thracians, as also which Caesar made upon the Spaniards is here set down. Likewise how the Salassians, a people inhabiting the Alps, were utterly subdued.

Of the CXXXVI, Book.

Rhetia was conquered by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus his wives son, Agrippa Caesar's son in law did: and by Drusus was the general review and tax taken.

Of the CXXXVII, Book.

The Cities of Germany situate on either side the Rhene, are by Drusus besieged and assailed. The tumult and insurrection which arose in France, by reason of the foresaid review or tax, was appeased. And there was created unto Divus Caesar at the confluence of the two rivers, Arax and Rhodanus: and a Priesthood created to offer thereupon, one C. Julius Vercondaridubius an Hednan.

Of

Of the CXXXVIII, Book.

Here is shewed how the Thracians were by L. Pilo tamed. Likewise how the Thracians, Temachar, by Drusus, Octavia the sister of Augustus departed this life, having buried before her son Marcellus: whose monument still remain, namely the Theatre and gallery bearing his name, as if they had been dedicated by Marcellus.

Of the CXXXIX, Book.

The war which Drusus managed against the nations beyond Rhene is here reported. In which war the chief persons that fought were Senecius and Anechius, Tribunes of the Nervian State. Nero the brother of Drusus subdued the Dalmatians and Pannonians. Peace was concluded with the Parthians: and upon capitulation the military ensignes were delivered up again to their Kings, which fell under the conduct of Crassus, and afterwards of Antonius were lost, and by them taken.

Of the CXL, Book.

In this book is related the war which Drusus fought against the Cities and States of Germany beyond the Rhene. Himself fell from his horse and brake his leg, by reason that his horse fell thereon: upon which fracture he died thirty daies after. His corpse was by his brother Nero (who being sent for upon the news of his sickness, rode in post) brought through to Rome, and bestowed in the tomb of C. Julius. Praised he was by Caesar Augustus his father in law, and at his funeral for a small forewell, he was entituled with many honourable names.

To the Reader.

The history of Titus Livius, as it was by him passing well penned otherwise, and none thereto in Latine comparable: so in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a singular light to give direction in a story) he is somewhat defective and unlike himself, so as he cannot be praised without exception. But if we consider the huge volumes which he wrote, and namely, in his declining age; the variety and disagreement of former authors, whom he followed, who before him faulted also in this point: and whereof he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned if his memory failed somewhat in this behalf. For where shall we find a man that is ἀπαρτα σοφός, omnique ex parte bonus? And indeed, if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profession by it self, and required a whole man: so many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deserved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthily is T. Pomponius Atticus praised by Cicero his friend, for digesting the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book? As for Pompeius Fiacus, who lived in the time of Augustus Caesar, he collected a catalogue and register of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were chosen successively, and how they governed from time to time: which as he caused to be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetual memory to posterity: so thereby he deserved also to have his own statue erected near the Temple of Vesta, for an everlasting memorial of so great a benefit. But what is there so durable, that time waleth not? What so conspicuous and evident, but troublesome dates may overwhelm and hide in oblivion? Thus amidst that havoc which the Goths and Vandals made in Italy, there remained in one fourth part extant of Livertory: thus in that general confusion of Rome, their records of Pompeius Fiacus were defaced, broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitoll and other stately edifices. But the revolution of times, as it hath brought to light again some reliques of Livy: so it hath discovered also those marbles of Verrinus: for in the time of Paul the third, Pope of Rome, the fragments of the said times were digged out of the ground between the Roman Forum and the broad street Via Sacra: brought forth also & laid abroad in the Capitoll to the view of the world. To which as the true touch-stone certain learned men of late daies have laid to their own labors in that kind, namely, Bartholomew Martian of Millan, Omphrius Puvionius of Verona, Charles Sigonius of Modena, and Francis Robortellus of Udine: and comparing the same as also the annals gathered by Henry Glareanus before time, with the said antiquities of Verrinus late found, have recovered much light to the history of Livy, and supplied his wants in that behalf. I thought it not amiss therefore to gratifie my countrymen in some measure this way also, and deliver the same in English which I found annexed to the best editions in Latine, as followeth.

CHRONOLOGIE

HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS,

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaccus in the Capitoll, and set out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Consuls.

The causes of dissent and repugnance in Historiographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the City of Rome.

Since we intend to set forth a Kalender or Register of the Consuls mentioned in the History of Livius, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity, and discordance of the times, is so dark and intricate, that not only the learned and most experienced Historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient time very often complained thereof: we think it not impertinent to our purpose, briefly to search into the causes of this dissent: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which seemeth to accord best with the Historical truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authenticall and approved writers. For seeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times: what is more unfitting for it than to mislead and want that which is the chiefeft point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It seemeth therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Consuls, there be three especiall causes.

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entred into that Magistracy, is by the Roman Historiographers, not after one sort but diversely set down. For Dionysius (a most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reporteth, that the KK. reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Messala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK. which happened in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Consuls. To which opinion Livy also subscribeth in the end of his first book, saying, that the regiment of KK. continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Europius in his first book writeth that the seven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years: which account agreeth with Sex. Rufus in his abridgement. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two last named reckon the years only of every Kings reign, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interregne, which Dionysius, Livius, Messala, and the rest insert between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romulus, the interregne continued one year. Consider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in severall, Europius and Sexius Rufus both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Dionysius, and therefore so that this difference is not much. But others there be (as Ensebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK. reigned but 243 years, and take the interregne withall: whose judgment, Orosius, Jordanides, and Beda seem to follow. For Orosius in the first chapter of his second book recordeth, that Brutus the Consul in that very year namely the 244, put his own sons to death. The Kings reigned not precisely 20 many years just but, for that some (and namely, Romulus) went over some months and daies, Dionysius and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Priscus: but the other above named, together with Ensebius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and assigned but only seven and thitty years to the reign of King Priscus. To this may be added another reason of the like nature: namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, so they are no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entred upon the first day of January: but Miscrobis in the first book of his Saturalia and seventh chapter, seemeth to imply that they took their Consuls place the first of June, saying, (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely, upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquin) he solemnized a sacrifice to the goddess Ceres upon mount Calvus.

Others

Others again write, how this hapned the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of stone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his Kalendar thus writeth:

*King Tarquin with his sons then fled: The Consuls yearly bear
The sovereign rule at Rome: since that, no King ever reigned there.*

Some there are besides of opinion, that they entred the first day of July: and of their mind see-meth Joachimus Perionius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long since been clearly and learnedly consulted by two great and excellent clarks, Omphobius Pansius, and Sigonius: since it is plain that it was the six hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Consuls began their government the first of January. But in setting down this certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Macianus thinke this way and faith, That the first day of the Consuls government was the six and twentieth day of May. But Pansius thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26 day of February. And this diversity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usual day of any month whereon the Consuls were wont to begin their Magistracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the six hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the first day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magistrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he sheweth not before he cometh to the three hundred and two year, and then he faith in his third book. That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at leastwise we may collect by him (when he faith that this time was solemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called solemn, which is by law usually observed. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fifth book, that this time also was altered: for whereas the first day of December was the usual time that Magistrates began to execute their office, he faith, that it was changed, in these words, The principal Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infortunity of their Generals (that so shamefull an overthrow was received) joined and advised, not to expect and stay for the ordinary time of the election but presently to create new military Tribunes in Consuls authority, who should enter into their government the first day of October. &c. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole sentence accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gainst it. But Sergius and Legianus withstood this Act of the Senat, and denied flatly to resign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after within one page, he sheweth that the usual day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of December to the first of September, saying, When this speech was received with a general applause of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about six years after, he faith, by occasion that both Consuls lay sick it was ordained that the first of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, whatsoever it was, for named it is not: and therefore uncertain. But this hapned in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book sheweth in these words: And when the Consuls were commanded to resign up their Magistracy before the time, to the end that new Consuls might the sooner be created, against so great troubles of war, &c. For in these words [The sooner, &c.] he declareth that the usual day of entrance into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly set down what day this was: so the other was as well known: for soon after, and namely the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of July. Immediately therefore (quoth he) the new Consuls, L. Angulius Marcius and Cn. Plautius were joynted that day (even the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, were it was February: like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held always during the second Punic war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livy testifieth in many places (which to quote is needless) as in the first book of the second Punic war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who seeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependeth upon a precise exact firm, and settled reckoning of years months, and daies: and seeing that in Livius story it is neither expressly shewed, what year month or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered: considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered, than the very usual day of entering into Magistracy: what marvel is there, if authors dissent so much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, ascribe these Magistrates created to this year, others attribute the same to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionysius and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that therein passed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrences of greatest antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome, and which by many writers aforetime had been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those things especially, which from the time a little before the second Punic war had been achieved by the people of Rome, unto the age wherein himself lived, but because (as Polybius most wisely and pithily writeth) a general story cannot be understood by particular registers; and for that an Historiographer study & endeavour ought to be employed rather in an universal treatise, than in particular discourses: therefore, left so great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should seem maimed & imperfect: in the formost 20 books he lightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the second Punic war. But Dionysius professing purposely to describe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpass and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourse of affairs; inasmuch as those things whereof Livy hath scantily made 3 books, he hath declared at large in eleven. Hereupon if a man read in Dionysius, the ancient beginning and original of the Roman Empire, and examine well the times how they are by him digested & compare the same with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhaughtiness of the later. But if the indifferent reader consider the purpose and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praise; & whereas Livy making haste to be excused than reproved for it, slightly handled some things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excused than reproved for it.

To these three causes above rehearsed, others also might be adjoined; namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may suffice only to touch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and admonish the reader by the way; that albeit in the digesting and reckoning of the Coss, we have let before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrinus Flaccus; and according thereto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 250 as also the other, which Verrinus rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Oncophorus Parricinus a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verrinus and they that followed him rated out was the 423, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times usually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

THE calculation of years was taken and observed by men in old time divers and sundry waies. The Achæans (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests: as for example, if Chrysis such a year were chief Priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of years from the said Chrysis. But many have derived and fetched the course and consequence of their acts and affairs, from the years before Tras was built, or else after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandfater by the mothers side and which by his son Iphiclus (or Iphim, as some will have it) were renewed that year from that time (I say) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, especially among the Grecians, whose story (as Eschylus affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympiad. The Hebrews (like as other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians from their Eponymy (as they called them) but that in their Archæologia, [that is, the election of their Magistrates] which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wise, ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἡγουμένη τῇ δεκάτῃ ἢ ἐνδεκάτῃ, i.e. the tenth or eleventh of the first Prytania. And hereof it seemeth, that the name cometh τῇ δεκάτῃ; as it is from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, made their Kalender, and registered their acts by such and such Consuls; noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities foundation. But about it there is much more diversity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearse the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome was founded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off, Timæus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Affrick by the Tyrians, namely in the 38 year before the first Olympiad.

L. Cincius (a Senator of Rome by calling) saith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympiad. Q. Fabius Pictor (a most ancient writer of the Roman story and of greatest credit) attributeth it to the first year of the eighth Olympiad.

Polybius Megapolitanus and Diodorus Siculus quote the second year of the 7 Olympiad. Appollodorus, Q. Lutatius Catellus, Cornelius Nepos, Erastosthenes, M. Porcius Cæcilius, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, and Theophilus Antiocheus, name the first year of the 7 Olympiad.

M. Verrinus Flaccus (the avoucher of the Capitoline stone-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solinus, Clement Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympiad.

L. Tarantius

L. Tarantius Firmianus, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Caesar, C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Chæronæus, Domitianus Caesar Augustus, P. Cornelius Tacitus, Cassius Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Augustus, Conformis, M. Julius Philippus Augustus, Ensepius Pamphilus, Cæsarionis, Eutropius, Paulus Orosius, Paulus Diaconus Longobardus: and after the time of C. Cæsar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the sixth Olympiad.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authors is induced, & whereby they would seem to confirm their several opinions, needles it is in this place for to declare: both because the speculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarchus in Romulus, Solinus in the 1. chapter of his Polyhistor, and Cæsar in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so thoroughly handled by Oncophorus Parricinus in the first book of his Calendar, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilia or Palilia. Now was this a festival day to Pales the goddess of shepherds, celebrated by the said shepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chasing away of wolves, for the preservation of their sheep and cattell from diseases, or for the saie yeaning and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter wrieth Propertius in his fourth book, in this wise.

*A festa there was, Palilia, our fathers did call,
And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall.*

Ovid also in the fourth book of his Fasts:

A time full meet they chose, with pough the plot to mark, Dime Pales was laid, and so began the work.

The fame is avouched by M. Tullius Plutarchus, Solinus, and others. And that these Palilia were celebrated ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calendars, as also by the fame authors before rehearsed.

Of the first sovereign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely, of the KK, who were in number seven.

ALL sorts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are set down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fatal course of destiny or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no Common-weal in manner there can be found, wherein they proceeded to one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK, ruled it: but when they by their excessive outrage and inordinate lust exercised upon their Citizens and subjects, were dissolved and expelled, the Coss, (and after them the Tribunes military in Coss, authority) were dissolved. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (simply the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturnius and Drusus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill such time as their power and authority was by Sylla rent in twain, and the Commons disfeized of their lands and killed: then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal persons of the City. But at length, when it was oppressed again by the civil war of Pompey and Cæsar, the sovereign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Cæsar alone; wherein, being first shaken a few years before, through the wicked infolency and lust of the three Trimmurs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter ruin. We therefore will briefly go through all these sorts of government, in that successive order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

Romulus the first King of the Romans, reigned 37 years.

Romulus, the founder of the City, reigned 37 years: for so many Livy assigneth unto him. Likewise Dionysius in the first book, which he repeateth also in the second; and Plutarch in Numa dissenteth not from them, howsoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearsing his worthy acts attributeth unto his reign 37 years. Only Eutropius in 1. book 4. chap. alloweth unto him 39 years: but Cyprian thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having reigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) 37 years: in which time, he laid the first ground-work of the Roman Empire, with excellent laws and ordinances, and established both civil and also military discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nona Caputina: by occasion that he in mustering and reviewing his army at the lake of Caprea, was conveyed out of mens sight: whereupon the people stood amazed at the sudden death of their King, as Plutarch & Dionysius do witness. This Romulus after his deification was named Quirinus, of which surname Ovid in his Kalender giveth these reasons,

Some read
thus,
* Latinis.
* Arma.
* Romanus vi-
cerat, but corruptly.

Sive quod basta quiris, priscis est dicta * Sabinis:
Bell icus a telo, venit in * astra Deus:
Sive suo regi nomen possuere Quirites,
Sen qua * Romani junxerat ille Cures.

A spear, old Sabins Quirina call'd, which Romulus us'd in fight :

This martial man a god became, and so Quirinus hight, Quirites eke his subjects liege, their King this name might give:
Or eke the Curies, whom he brought with Romans for to live.

That he was bafe born, and could not avouch his own father, befide other writers, Plutarch efpecially affirmeth in his Theſeur. Howbeit, the old opinion went current, that he was by Mars begot in ſtealth of a veittal virgin, Ilia, Rhea, or Sylvia, for ſo many names there go of her: and that firſt he was called Romus, of Ruma, which ſignifieth a teat or papp, and afterwards
by way of flattery, Romulus.

I Interregents.

Interregents.
FOR one year after the death of Romulus, the Nobles fell to variance, & I prove who should be K. but by reason that no one person excelled above the rest in that flatte is newly debated, there grew several fictions & debates in their head-corporations. They who were defended from the Sabins (because after the death of E-tur none of them reigned with Romulus in a equal society) were desirous to have a K. created out of their body, because they would not forgo their hold and possession in the Empire. But the old Romans could not away with a stranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to setup a K. as having not raised yet the sweetnets of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared (by reason that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked against them) lest some foreign force might assail their City lest this without sovereign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an association of rule, and made ten Decuries: and in every Decury created one to have the sovereignty over the rest. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy saith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionysius writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sibins & as many Romans. After this they call Iorsand their Decury unto whom the lottery first fell, ruled the City: howbeit, not all at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Licitors going before him. Five daies he governed no longer; and so by this order in course, the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined, he whose lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the second the imperial dignity together with the ensignes thereof: and he again, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the tenth. Thus when these ten first Interregents had passed one 50 daies a second Decury of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a years space in this regency. This government was of the thing it self called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewise were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Magistracy of the Interregents first deviled among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency, but also after the deceale of Numa, Tullius, and Anchus Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-wealth, after the time of yearly Magistrates expired, the said government took place very often before the creation of new: for they held the assembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this Interregment was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily passed five daies) to execute all those functions in the City which belonged either to KK, or Coss, namely, to minister justice, to rule the Common-wealth to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the general assembly for chusing new Magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionysius in his second book, Livy in his first, Plutarch in Numa, Senat, Rufinus, Eusebius and other old writers, have written at large.

Numa Pompilius the second K. reigned 43 years.

O Ne year of Interregny being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this a grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their servitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them instead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senators should create a King, whom they would, for whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in justice & wisdom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he reigned three and forty years, all accord, save Ennius, Eufebius, and Castidorus (late writers) who set down but one and forty, as Onoprius and Sepunus have observed. Of this K. Diomifinus in his second chapter, Livy in his first, Salmus in his second chapter, Plutarch Pliny and Europus in his life; in like sort Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years, as Plutarch writeth: for born he was (as he himselfeith) the same day whereon Romulus laid the first foundation of the City, namely the twelfth Calends of May. Now for the name of Numa, some lay it was the forename of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Numa were forenames, as also by this conjecture, for that the sons of Numa are by Diomifinus called by some sundry names divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Aruns, Volusus, Drusus, Eufebius, Fulvus, Mamurrius, and certain others names, were at first forenames, as Martianus in his Annals hath very well noted.

Tullus Hostilius, the third King of Rome,
reigned 32 years.

Numa being deceased, the Interregency took place again: during which time an A. & O. Senat passed, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advice of the Nobles, Tullus Hostilius was created the third K; of the Romans, in the 81 year after the foundation of the City. Who having raised Alba, commanded the Albans to be translated to Rome. Their Commons he made free denizens, and the principall Nobles he took into the order of Senators. After Numa he reigned 32 years, as all writers most constantly affirm. He perished as Dionysius witnesseth, by accident that his house was on fire, wherein his wife and children and all their household besides were consumed and burnt. Some say, that his palace took fire by lightning through the ire of the gods, for that he had tormented some sacrifices and holy rites: others write, that it was occasioned by the treacherous practise of Anus Martius, who reigned next after him. Of him Dionysius writeth in his 3 book: That he carried before him the name of Hostili is appareth by this, that both his father and grandfere bare the said name. A Prince he was, not only far unlike to Numa, but also more fierce and stout than Romulus.

24
Ancus Martius, the fourth King of Romans,
reigned 24 years.

King Tullius was departed this life, there was an Interregit by the Nobles declared; who held the assembly for election in the 114 year from the foundation of the City: wherein the people created Ancus Martius the fourth K. of the Romans, and the Senators approved the fame. He built Florentia a town 16 miles distant from the City of Rome; and fought seven batels, Luvinus, Dionysius, and Salentin say, that he reigned 24 years; but Eufebius, Eutropius, and Calliodorus, 23. What death he died, neither Livy in his first book, nor Dionysius in his 3 do set down: notwithstanding that by them his noble acts are set out at large. Now Ancus (as Sax. Pompeian hath reported) is he called, who hath an arm bowing inward, for as it cannot be pure straight forth.

38
L. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth K. of Romans, reigned 38. years.

This T. quinus being left by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the first that ambitiously intercepted the kingdom to himself; he sent the sons of Ancus, during the time of Interregency, out of the way, as it were to hunting, and made an oration unto the people to win their hearts & affections to him; and so with the suffrages of the people, and authority of the Nobles, he was by the Interregent declared King in the 170 year after the foundation of Rome, and in the 41 Olympiad. This noble Prince as well for warlike prowess as peaceable policy and government, at the length (being above fourscore year old) was foretold by the secret trains of one of the two sons of Ancus

Martius, in the eight and thirty year of his reign, according to Livy and Dionysius, whose judgment we follow : or in the 37. as Sextus Metellus, Ruffus, Entropius, Cassiodorus, Berthinus, and Beda write ; I like as we have before shew'd, Priscus he was Iurorned after wards, because he liv'd before Tarquinius Superbus, laith Sex. Pompeius, unto whom accord Dionysius and Laurentius Valla : who writeth that the addition of Priscus was given unto him, not by men of that time wherein he liv'd, but by the age following. But Livy sheweth plainly, that he had the Iurorn of Priscus given him, even then when he came first into the City, because he was born before Superbus. He also was called Lucumo, and was the son of Demetrius the Corinthian, descended from the family of the Brahchides.

Servius Tullius, the sixth K. of the Romans, reigned four and forty years.

Atter Prince Tarquinius was slain presently Servius Tullius was the first that (without any election of the people, yet with the generall consent of the Nobles) took upon him the Roman kingdom, in the year from the foundation of the City 176. Concerning whose conception, we must note particulars that which Pliny writeth in the 36 book after this manner.
During the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, there appeared suddenly the genitall member of the masculine sex upon the hearth where the fire was kept, & thereupon presently a captive woman and bond-servant of Tarasque the Queen, named Oersilia, sitting there by the fire side, conceived and was with child; and lo was Servius
Tullius born, who succeeded in the kingdom.
Afterwards as the boy lay asleep within the K.K. palace, his head was leen on a light fire, and supposed he was the son of the familiar Lur of that house. In which regard, he intulced first the Comptulca and plaies to the Lurs, concerning his birth. Plutarch hath written more in his book of the Romans fortune. By the crafty and subtil device of his wives mother Tanquil, he attained to the Crown in the fourth year of the first Olympiads, and reigned 44 years; but by the villanous complot of Tarquinius his son in law, and Tullia his own daughter and Tarquin wife, he was most impudently slain in the very third;
which thereupon was called Sceleratus. As touching the years of this Kings reign, some con-troverisie there is among writers: for Livy, Dionysius, and Solinus (whom we have followed) write, that he reigned 44 years: but Mellala Corvinus, Sex. Rufinus, Eutropius, Eusebius, Cassio-dorus, and Bedae 34, and not above. Howbeit, in adding those ten to the reign of Tarquin afterwards, they hinder not this gross sum and computation of the years: for they set them down 35, which Livy, Dionysius, and Solinus make but 25. This K. took the name of Servius, by occasion of his own fortune, for that his mother Oersilia a captive / but a most beautiful and wise woman of Corniculum / bare him during her bondage: but Tullius he was called, by the name of his fathers kindred, as Dionysius wrieth in his fourth book, reckoning up many acts by him atchieved. . .

L. Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh King of Romans, ruled 25 years.

IN the two hundred and twentieth year after the foundation of the City, L. Targuntinus the younger, having killed Servius Tullius, entered upon the Roman kingdom with force of arms, nor by Interregent, nor yet any right of law. Superbus he was named for his cruel demeanour, in that he forbade to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law by him murdered: giving out that Romulus likewise died and lay unburied. He was the son of L. Targuntius Priscus the King; as Q. Pictor, An. Gellius Licinius Macer, Verrius Flaccus, and Urbicus have written. Howbeit, Dionysius of L. Pif- in his Annals, by most strong reasons disprove their error, and by the certain computation of the years sheweth how it cannot possibly be so, but rather that he was the son of Terquinius Priscus his son, who died in the life of Priscus. Five and twenty years he reigned according to Livy in his first book, Dionysius in his fourth, and Solinus in his Polyhistor. But Cassiodorus, Eusebius, Eutropius, and Bedae ascribe unto him five and thirty years, adding unto his reign those ten years which they took from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occasion of error to the later writers. Of him Dionysius Livy, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobius, and Eutropius have written much. Collect them, into one from the year of these Kings reign, and thereof will arise the number of two hundred forty four.

Of the first Elections of Consuls.

THis is the second change of the Common-weal, by occasion that Superbus the King, as well for his insolent and proud government, as for the villany offered by Sextus the Kings ion to Lucretia, was expelled, and liberty recovered: whereupon the soveraign government year by year was committed to two men, who first were named Prators, for that they were chosen over the people: then Judges, because they decided their controversies: and lastly, Consuls, in that they advised and provided for the good of the Common-weal: as Cicero in the third book of Laws declareth in these words: Let there be two invested in royall government; and of ruling, judging, and counsell-giving, be they called Prators, Judges, and Consuls: let them also have the sovereignty of command in war. Now the first Consuls or Prators were created by Sp. Lucretius (father of Lucretia; and Interregent for the time) in a general assembly by the voices of the Centuries, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the King. The first Consul had all the right, prerogatives, and regall enignes of the KK, this only provided, that both of them should not have the rods and axes carried before them for fear of presenting any terror to the people. Both of them were chozen out of the Patritii: which for this intent I advertise the Reader of, that the progress of the Common-weal might be known: seeing that in process of time they came to be created out of the Commons also. Moreover, as concerning the year month, and day, when as the first Consuls entred their government, something were to be laid in this place: but because we have spoken before of the variety and dissention of Authors thereabout: therefore letting pass these circumstances, proceed we to the very Consuls, who by the testimony of all writers were first chozen: namely,

IT is recorded by all writers, that L. Brutus, Brutus, and L. Targ. Collatinus, were the first Coss, or Prators of the Roman people; who in the end of the 244 year first day of March (after the Targuins KK, the father and the son were expelled the City) in an assembly of the Centuries were solemnly pronounced and declared Coss. But after that Brutus had compelled his Colleague Tullius to resign up his Consulship, because he was suspected for the affinity and name of the Targuins (as L. Piso in Gellius the 5 book and 29 cap. Livius, Plutarch, and Cicero, do write;) or by occasion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his sisters son. (as Dionysius reporteth) he was belated in his place Pub. Valerius Volturnus the son of Volturnus whose helping hand he had used especially in banishing the KK. Of whose Consulship, Polybians in the third book, Dionysius, Livy, Valerius Max. 4. book 4. chapter, Plutarch in Poplicola, and Pliny 36 book, chap. 15, have made mention, But Valerius, after that Brutus in his Magistracy was slain by Arms the son of Superbus (for the King his father had levied war against the Romans) in a general Court of all the Centuries, took unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus the father of Lucretia : and to him (being the elder) submitted the preeminence of sovereignty. And soon after, within few days upon his death, (for he was very aged) he returned unto him M. Horatius Vulsellus for his Colleague in the Consulship. The said Brutus was called Poplicola, for that during his Magistracy, he enacted certain laws very popular, and namely, concerning the appeal from the Consuls to the people, and the receiving of the state-government from the said people, as Living and Dionysius do witnesse. In the vulgar books, as also in the old written Copies (whether by error or of purpose) was not Iwe read this name evermore Publicus but still in one and the same signification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwise have had infinity one with another, as Quintilian writeth, namely a with u, and p with f. For in antique titles and inscriptions, you shall read often Publicus for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the first year after the Kings were exiled, Confat. Rome were these, L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tar. Collatinus, P. Valerius Publicus, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and M. Horatius Pulvillus.

P. Valerius, II. T. Lucretius.

THe Consulship of these two is recorded unto us by Dionysius, Livius and Cassiodorus; Onuphrius Paganinus, giveth unto Lucretius the surname of Triumphinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that house; and also, because by an ancient Chronographer in the records of Cappisian, he is named Triumphus. Now for Publius the Etymology thereof according to Sextus, is twofold: For some call him Pub, who hath been brought up at the publicke charges; others again name him fo, who was a ward before he had his name given him.

247
P. Lucretius, P. Valerius Poplicola,
I Poets calleth this Lucretius by the forename
Loſe P. but other books of TITUS, Dionysius writeth, that P. Valerius Poplicola the third time, and M. Horatius the second time were Coff. Plutarch speaketh of the third Consulship only of P. Valerius, Oſpſubius and Sigonius follow Dionysius. As for Caſſiodorus, he leaveth out altogether these Consuls.

Sp. Lærtius, T. Herminius.
AFTER Poplicolæ the third time, and Publi- us the second time Confuls, Dionysius hath placed Sp. Lærtius and T. Herminius. The fame doth Cassiodorus. And the book noted by Cri- pinian, under an unknown author, hath in it thus written, Poplicola I. L. & Publius Rufus & Aquilino; Valerio & Tuberto. Luv omiteth these Confuls, and in their place putteth down M. Valerius, and P. Posthumius: but as Sigoni- us thinketh, the fault is in the writers of the book.

But that this year should necessarily come between Omphrys (thinker) according to the book of M. Tullius Cicero entitled Brutus and certain it is that Perius P. Cicero in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected these Confuls. Now this name Largus is derived of Lars, and so ought it to be written and not Largius, as corruptly it is to be seen in some Copies of Livy and Dionysius. As for the surname to Hermianus, Omphrys supposeth it to have been Egfrinus, both for that the mention of that surname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline marbles, as also because of what family else it should be, no writer ever hath delivered, This Spartius was the brother of Titus Lartius the first Dictator, as writeth Dionysius.

M. Valerius, P. Postumius,
Platarch, as also Diomius and Lucius witteth, that this M. Valerius was brother
M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he said to be the son of Valerius. Postumius for his surname had Tiberius, Witness Zonaras together with Plutarch in Poplicola and Diomius in the sixth and fix books. Him P. Postumius calleth the brother of Quintus, where he treateth of the Consular Embassadors sent unto the Common-weale in the year 266. This P. Postumius was Orpilius teacheth, was by old authors written without the aspiration (h) either because of Post a P. Postu- mus and Postumius and to Postumius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote uons without the said (h). Now is he called Postumius, who was born last, as Ciculus with sixth in his commentaries of ancient readings, Enobarbi, lawyers pronounce e the word with the aspiration, and call by that name him on y. who was born after his fathers death: and with them according Varro and Plutarch in the life of Sylla.

P. Valerius IIII. T. Lucretius.

Dionysius, Livius, Plinius and Iulius Africanus report these for Consuls this year. But the registers of Cassiodorus deliver unto us Popilius Laetorius fourth time and Treptius Valerius Maximus in the fourth book and fourth chapter written thus, Valerius Popilius begin in his Consulship with Brutus; and the same in bare three Consuls afterwards, to the great contentment of the people.

Agrippa Menenius, P. Postumius.

Dionysius hath for Coss. this year, Agrippa Menenius Laetanus, and P. Postumius the second time. Lucy C. Strophion Latinus books, and the Greek records disagree not from him. Valerius Atrix, 4 books, 4 cap. corruptly call eth him M. Menenius Agrippa. Now Agrippae they called who are born into the world with extraordinary throws & birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward against nature.

252

Opiter Virginius, Sp. C. filius.

L Points, Zouaves, and Cassidors, name themselves Confuls rather thus. Dionysius yet is more liberal, calling Sp. Cassius, Hecellinus, and Opiter Virginius, Treasurers, But whom Dionysius calleth Magistres, Cicero in his Latinus termeth Cassius, Hecellinus, and Culpinius is Kalender Vise Illus. For first of Vesuvius cometh Hecellus, and so from thence they derive Hecellinus. Opiter (to note that by the way, as Sen. Pompeius saith) is he, whose father died before his grandfathers. And the word foundeth thus much, as if he were born after his fathers death: or because he re-acted his grandeur for his father.

253

Posthumus Cominius. T. Lartius, Livy, Dionysius, Zonaras, and Cassiodorus name these simply thus. But Cuspinian Kalender, giveth to Posthumus the surname Aureus, &c. to Lartius Ruffus. And those whom Cuspinian book nameth Ruffi, the Greek registers by another word, but to the same fence, call Flavi.

254

Ser. Sulpitius. M. Tullius. Livy and Cassiodorus allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpitius the addition of Camerinus, like as the Kalender of Cuspinian; and to Tullius of Longus: as also doth Dionysius, who writeth, that Manius Tullius died in the time of his Magistracy, and that in his place there was none substituted, because the year was wearisome at an end. Of this M. Tullius, Cicero speaketh in his Brutus, saying, As if I should avouch my self to be descended of M. Tullius the Patritian, who in the tenth year after the expulsion of the KK, was Col. with Ser. Sulpitius. This surname Manius, as Ser. Pompeius saith, cometh hereupon that some one was born many, i.e. in the morn. like as Lucius, who entered into the world by daylight. And in another place, this Manius (qd. he) consecrated the field Neurense, from whom many noble and famous men sprung, and continued many years. Whereupon arose the Proverb, Mutis Manis Aricia, i.e. there be many Mani at Aricia. Moreover, he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at least) whilst they were in bondage, or else, who when his mother was dead, lived still in her womb, and so was saved.

255

C. Vetusius. T. Ebutius. The forename of this Vetusius or Veturius in some Copies of Livy, as Marlian sheweth in his annals of Colli, is Caius; in other Cneus; in Cassiodorus, Lucius; in Dionysius Publius; who also nameth Veturius, Geminus; and T. Ebutius Helius, and in some place Uasas, but faintly: for the Latine writers also affirm his surname to be Helius. The Greek Records likewise have Helius and Geminus. Moreover they that write him Vetusius, imitate the ancient manner of putting, for, as when they call men Eufis, V. Ies, and Papfi. But they who call him Veturius follow the latter usage. Of this matter Livy speaketh in the year 292.

256

Q. Clatius. T. Lartius. Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus: but Dionysius surnameth T. Lartius Flavius; and Q. Clatius, Siculus: to whom accord the registers both of Cuspinian and Sicily. This T. Lartius is the same, as appeareth by Dionysius who before was Col. and therefore is his surname Flavius rightly added. The house of the Clatii, as also of the Julii. Ser. Lii. Geganis, uriani and Q. Julii descended from the Albans first, as Dionysius writeth.

257

An. Sempronius. M. Minutius.

Thus Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us these Colli. But Cuspinian registers and the Sicilian, surname them Atratinus and Augurinus. And Dionysius nameth them A. Sempronius Rhasinus, and M. Minutius Augurinus; albeit he maketh no mention of Augurinus, but in the second Consulship of Minutius. As for An. Sempronius he was so called, who being new born, was nourished and fostered by the gods.

An. Posthumus. T. Virginus.

These are these Colli. Set down by Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus. And to them verily the Greek records put to the surnames of Albus and Calimontanus. But the book of Cuspinian ad des Regillensis & Tricostus besides: so that by him they are thus written, An. Posthumus Albus Regillensis, and T. Virginus Tricostus Calimontanus.

259

App. Claudius and P. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus record these for Colli, this year. The registers as well of Cuspinian as Sicily, Sabinus and Priscus: But Dionysius more fully, App. Claudius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priscus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, first named, Attilius Claudius, and afterwards, App. Claudius; who from Regillus, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabinus Regillensis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patritii, as Livy, Dionysius, and Suetonius in Tiberius make report. This man was grandfire to that App. Claudius the Decemvir. As touching his forename, there is some difference: whereof ye may see Onuphrius and Marlianus in their Kalenders.

260

A. Virginus and T. Vetusius.

These are thus set down by Livy and Cassiodorus, as here they be named. Dionysius writeth them, An. Virginus Montanus, and T. Vetusius Geminus. The register of Cuspinian, barely Montanus and Geminus. Montanus and Calimontanus are both one. Padianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth these Consuls, An. Virginus Tricostus, and L. V. Virginius Cicorius: whereby it may be understood, that both of them had two surnames, to wit, the one Tricostus Calimontanus, and the other, Geminus Cicorius; for so elsewhere there other writers testifie, Cuspinian observeth, that this Cicorius is also called Coturnius by some writers.

Sp. Cassius and Posthumus Cominius. Livy and Dionysius. Oftem speaketh Cicero also in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cuspinian his books set forth unto us, Vicellinus & Aureus, the Sicilian records, Aureus, and Vicellinus. And that these same were Consuls together in this year, and entred upon their government the first of September, sooner then the custom was, as Dionysius writeth.

T. Geganis and P. Minutius.

Dionysius in the beginning of the seventh book nameth for Colli, this year T. Geganis Macrinus, and P. Minutius. The same doth Livy in the second book. Cassiodorus likewise and Enropius. Orosius also in the second book and fifth chapter, leaving out one of their surnames. But the Greek records and Cuspinian book surname them both, the one Macrinus, the other Augurinus. And these are ordinary surnames; this to Minutius, and the former to the Geganis.

263

M. Minutius, and An. Sempronius.

Livy and Cassiodorus set them down, omitting their surnames, as also the numerall next II. But Dionysius recordeth them fully in this manner, A. Sempronius Atratinus the second time, and M. Minutius Augurinus likewise the second time. This year reckoneth Dionysius for the nineteenth, after that Poplicola the Col, published the law of appealing.

Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius.

After An. Sempronius and M. Minutius Colli, Dionysius bringeth in to succeed them, Q. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Sp. Lartius Flavius the second time. Cuspinian registers; Cornutus and Flavius, the Sicilian, Camerinus and Flavius. Moreover, Cornutus is an ordinary surname to the Sulpitii, as may be gathered out of the Capitoline tables of stone. And that these Colli, are not to be left out, either according to the account of the Capitol, or to make up and digest the sum gathered by Varro, appeareth by the Triumph of P. Valerius, which would not fall to the year 279, if we should deduct these Colli, out of the Kalender.

265

T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius.

Next after the former Consuls, there followed according to Dionysius, C. Iulius Iulus and P. Pinaris Rufus Consuls. Cuspinian his records deliver unto us, Iulus and Mamerminus; But the Greek, Iulus and Rufus. And that Mamerminus is a surname to the Pinaris, appeareth by another place. These Consuls Livy over-passeth, like as the other the year before: upon whom, they that undertook the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there want Consuls for two years. So that of himself the like may be said to that which he writeth in the ninth book of Piso, in this manner [These Consuls, Piso bringeth in immediately after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out two years, whereof we have reported that Clauianus and Volturnus were Consuls in the one, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forgot them in the digressing of the Anna's, or of purpose passed by them (notwithstanding he thought of those two couple of Consuls) it is uncertain. Moreover, the surname of C. Iulius, was transformed every where into Tullus and Tullius; but that it is to be read Iulius, both Marlianus, and also after him Pavanius sheweth. For this surname Iulus is set from Aeneas the son of E. Neas, and from the said surname is derived the denomination of a family; and therefore Virgilius saith,

The Iulian house at Rome, first came
From Iulus great, a prince of name.
And Livy speaking of the same in this wise saith; which Iulus, the house of the Iuli, avoucheth for the author of their name.

266

Sp. Cassius. Proculus Virginus.

But to leave these things; Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius, are by Dionysius, Livy and Cassiodorus, ranged Consuls in this year. In Cuspinian his Annals, there is Rutilius, the surname of Nautius; and likewise Vicellinus. But in the Sicilian, Nautius and Furius.

Servius Cornelius. Q. Fabius.

According to Livy the Consuls this year were T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius; whom Dionysius and Cassiodorus name to be T. Sicinius & C. Aquilius. The surnames of these by the Greek records and Cuspinian Kalender, were Tuscanus and Sabinus. As for Aquilius, he was so called (as Marlianus observeth) who was agilis colore, i. of a dusky black, or brownish colour.

L. Emilius. L. Furius.

Livy avoucheth Consuls for this year, Sp. Cassius and Proculus Virginus; and Dionysius. Sp. Cassius the second time, with Proculus Virginus. And Diadorus in his eleventh book, unto Virginus addeth the name Tricostus. The Greek records, as also those of Cuspinian make mention of Rutilius and Vicellinus. Now as concerning the name of Proculus, somewhat they be to called, for that they were born when their parents were old, quasi, Proculus progreffus, i. far slept in years.

Posthumus Cominius. T. Lartius.
Livy, Dionysius Zonaras and Cassiodorus name these simply thus. But Cuspinian Kalender, giveth to Posthumus the surname Auruncus; & to Lartius Rufus. And those whom Cuspinian book nameth Rufi, the Greek registers by another word, but to the same fence, call Flavi.

Ser. Sulpitius. M. Tullius.
Livy and Cassiodorus allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpitius the addition of Camerinus, like as the Kalender of Cuspinian; and to Tullius of Longus; as also doth Dionysius, who writeth, that Manius Tullius died in the time of his Magistracy; and that in his place there was none substituted, because the year was welnear at an end. Of this M. Tullius, Cicero speaketh in his Brutus, saying, As if I should avouch my self to be descended of M. Pompeius saith, cometh hereupon that some one was born manus, i.e. in the morn, like as Lucius, who entered into the world by daylight. And in another place, this Manius (qd he) consecrated the field Nemorensis, from whom many noble and famous men sprung, and continued many years. Whereupon arose the Proverb, Mulsi Manii Aricia, i.e. there be many Manii at Aricia. Moreover, he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at least) whiltes they were in bondage, or else, who when his mother was dead, lived still in her womb; and it was faved.

C. Vetusius. T. Ebutius.
The forename of this Vetusius or Veturius in some Copies of Livy, as Marlian sheweth in his annals of CoF, is Caius; in other Cneus; in Cassiodorus, Lucius; in Dionysius Publius; who also nameth Veturius, Geminus; and T. Ebutius Helius; and in some place Uadus, but faultily: for the Latine writers also affirm his surname to be Helus. The Greek Records likewise have Helus and Geminus. Moreover they that write him Vetusius, imitate the ancient manner of putting, i.e. as when they call men Eufis, V. lefi, and Papfi. But they who call him Veturius follow the latter usage. Of this matter Livy speaketh in the year 292.

Q. Cladius. T. Lartius.
Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus; but Dionysius nameth T. Lartius. Flavus; and Q. Cladius. Siculus: to whom accord the registers both of Cuspinian and Sicily. This T. Lartius is the same, as appeareth by Dionysius who before was CoF, and therefore is his surname Flavus rightly added. The house of the Cladii, as also of the Julii. Ser. M. Geganis, Uiratii and Q. Uiratii descended from the Albans first, as Dionysius writeth.

257

An. Sempronius. M. Minutius.

Thus Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us these CoF. But Cuspinian registers and the Sicilian, surname them Atracius and Augurinus. And Dionysius nameth them A. Sempronius Rhoetius, and M. Minutius Augurinus; albeit he maketh no mention of Augurinus, but in the second Consulship of Minutius. As for An. Sempronius he is called, who being new born, was nourished and fostered by the gods.

An. Posthumus. T. Virginius.

Thus are these CoF. set down by Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus. And to them verily the Greek records put to the surnames of Albus and Calpurnianus. But the book of Cuspinian addes Regillensis & Tricostus besides: so that by him they are thus written, An. Posthumus Albus Regillensis, and T. Virginius Tricostus Calpurnianus.

259

App. Claudius and P. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus record these for CoF. this year. The registers as well of Cuspinian as Sicily, Sabinus and Priscus: But Dionysius more fully, App. Cladius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priscus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, first named, Atius Claudius, and afterwards, App. Claudius: who from Regillus, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabinus Regillensis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patritii, as Livy, Dionysius, and Suetonius in Tiberius make report. A. Virginius and T. Vetusius.

These are thus set down by Livy and Cassiodorus, as here they be named. Dionysius writeth them, An. Virginius Montanus, and T. Vetusius Geminus. The register of Cuspinian, barely Montanus and Geminus. The Sicilian, Calpurnianus and Geminus. Montanus and Calpurnianus are both one. Padianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth these Consuls, *An. 261

Sp. Cassius and Posthumus Cominius.

So Livy and Dionysius. Of them speaketh Cicero also in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cuspinian his books set forth unto us, V. Vellinus & Auruncus. The Sicilian records, Auruncus and Vellinus. L. Lucertius Triptolimus, T. Veitinus Geminus

According to the Capitoline table, Aulus Posthumus; out of Livy, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, Pub. Furius Fusus, are noted for Consuls this year. Dionysius putteth to Furius the only gentile surname Medullinus (or Fusus). This A. Posthumus was the son of A. Posthumus the Dictator.

P. Volumnus, Serv. Sulpicius.

Livy and Cassiodorus write that there followed as Consuls this year, P. Servilius; but Dionysius nameth L. Aburnus and P. Servilius Priscus, Dionysius, L. Aburnus Elva and Pub. Servilius Structus. The Sicilian registers shew Priscus and Flavius Cuspianus, Elva and Priscus. The Capitol stones exhibit unto us P. Servilius the son of Sp. P. N. i. the sons son of Publius and surnamed Priscus.

292
C. Claudius, son of Appius, P. Valerius Poplicola.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius represent unto us as Consuls this year, L. Lucertius Triptolimus, and T. Veitinus (or Vatinius) Geminus; but Dionysius, L. Lucertius and T. Veitinus Cicerinus, Cuspianus his Kalender, Geminus and Triptolimus. The Sicilian Registers, Triptolimus and Veitinus: the Capitol monuments L. Lucertius Triptolimus.

Q. Fabius Vibulanus III, L. Cornelius Maluginensis

Livy and Cassiodorus profess for Consuls this year, P. Volumnus and Serv. Sulpicius. Dionysius, P. Volumnus, and Serv. Sulpicius Camerinus. The Capitol marbles have P. Volumnus Amintinus Gallus. Of the same Consul Valerius speaketh, in his first book and sixth chapter.

294
L. Minutius, C. Nautius.

Livy and Dionysius name, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus Consuls for this year: Dionysius, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Reginus. The Sicilian registers & Cuspianus call them Poplicola and Sabinus. The Capitoline marble hath this record, P. Valerius P. F. (son of P. Volumnus N. i. the sons son of Volumnus) surnamed Poplicola, but Livy, Dionysius, Orosius, & they that have ranged the Consuls in the Capitol, have reported that P. Valerius the Consul was slain in the battle against the bondslaves who this year (under the leading of Ap. Herodinus the Sabine) held the Capitol by force, and that in his head L. Quintius Cincinnatus was substituted.

Q. Minutius, C. Horatius Pulvillus.

Livy, together with Cassiodorus, declare for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius the third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis, Dionysius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius. Dionysius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Cornelius surnamed. The Sicilian registers, and Cuspianus Vibulanus and Maluginensis. The Capitol marble C. Fabius Vibulanus the third time.

296
M. Valerius, Sp. Virginius.

Both Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls, L. Minutius and C. Nautius, Dionysius, L. Minutius and C. Nautius the second time, Dionysius Minutius surnamed, and C. Nautius surnamed. The Capitol stones C. Nautius surnamed the second time. What this surname surnamed should mean, Sigonius and Orosius confesse they know not, and think in stead thereof I we should read Virginius, Valerius Maximus (3 book 2 chap. Of thankful persons) writeth these Consuls corruptly, Q. for Nautius, and Minutius.

297
T. Romulus, Sp. Veitinus.

Livy and Cassiodorus name for Consuls this year, Q. Minutius and M. Horatius Pulvillus; but herein they do amiss, as Sigonius and Orosius suppose for the same Livy writeth, that Caius Horatius Pulvillus died being Augur in the year 302. Dionysius nameth L. Posthumus and M. Horatius. Dionysius Q. Horatius and Q. Minutius. The Capitol records, C. Horatius Pulvillus, And the Sicilian registers, Pulvillus and Angurinus.

298
Sp. Tarpeius, A. Asterius.

In Livy and Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, we find Consuls this year, Valerius with Sp. Virginius. But in the twelfth book of Dionysius M. Valerius Laetia, and Sp. Virginius Tricostus. In Cuspianus Kalender Maximus and Calpurnius. In the Sicilian, Maximus and Virginius. In that of the Capitol, M. Valerius Max. As for Laetia, Plinius sheweth, that it is a surname of the Valerii. Of these Consuls also, Conferius maketh mention in his discourse of the plaies called Seculares.

299
P. Quinctius, Sext. Quinctilius

According to Livy, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, this year Veitinus and T. Romulus entered upon the Consulship. Dionysius delivereth unto us C. Veitinus Cicerinus, and T. Romulus; Vatinius, Cuspianus Kalender sheweth Geminus and Vatinius. The Sicilian, Romus and Veitinus. The Capitol records, T. Romulus, son of T. nephew or sons son of T. Vatinius. Of the same Romulus, Plinius also speaketh also 7 book, chapter 28.

300
T. Manlius, P. Sulpicius Capitolinus.

Spurius Tarpeius son of M. and nephew of M. surnamed Montanus Capitolinus, the lender of Veitinus Flaccus the with unto us for one Consul this year. Of whom, Dionysius, Dionysius, Livy, Pedanius upon Cicero his oration for Cornelius, and Cassiodorus make mention have only the surnames. Cuspianus book, and the Greek records, have Capitolinus. As for his colleague, they dissent and disagree. For Dionysius would have him to be Aulus Asterius Vontidius; but Dionysius Aulus Terminus, Livy and Pliny, the seventh book, chapter seven and twenty, A. Asterius. Sextus chapter 4, Gell. 1 book, chapter 11, A. Thermus. Lastly, Cassiodorus, A. Asterius, whom Sigonius and Orosius follow.

App. Claudius, P. Geminus.

Livy and Cassiodorus likewise report for this year Consuls, Sext. Quinctilius and P. Curatius. Dionysius, Sext. Quinctilius and Horatius, Dionysius, Sext. Quinctilius son of Pub. the Capitol stones name him Sext. Quinctilius son of Sex, nephew of Pub. For this surname Terminus is common both to the Horatii and Curatii, but Sigonius and Orosius allow Horatius rather.

302
Sext. Quintilius son of Sextus, nephew of Pub.

To this Consul the Greek records give the surname of Varnus. and to the Capitoline tables of stone do represent him. But Dionysius, Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus deliver the same man unto us without the surname. Who was his colleague, it is doubtful. For by Dionysius it is was P. Horatius: by Livy and Cassiodorus, Pub. Curatius; by Dionysius Terminus; which is the surname as well of the Curatii, as the Horatii. Orosius rather approveth of Curatius.

Decemviri Consular.

Livy and Dionysius, together with the Capitoline registers (as far forth as may be gathered by the broken fragments of the tables shew that App. Claudius and T. Geminus were Cof. elect for this year, but they resigned up the place, in regard of creating Decemviri. Now at touching this Decemvirat, the law Tarentina brought it into the commonwealth: which law A. Tarentinus Arsa, a Tribune of the Commons promulgated as touching five Quinquaginta to be created, who should let down laws to gage the Cof. authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too great and tolerable, and therefore required that it might be abated and made more moderate. Which law, after he had been for six year together hotely canvassed by the Trib. to no effect.

in the end waxed cold again, by reason that the said Trib. obtained a grant to double their own number. But afterwards upon the occasion that Romulus and Veitinus the Cof. bare themselves too extreme in rigor against the Cof. refusing warfare, the said law was let on foot again, and followed more hotly then before. Whereupon when the L. of the Senat were doubtful what to do, at length they resolved upon this point, whereof the principal adviser was T. Romulus to create certain laws, which should let down the rights and privileges of nobles and commons. And lock what ordinances by them were decreed, the same should bind both the one part and the other. The Cof. agreed to this determination, and the Trib. Postumius, Publius, and Serv. Sulpicius Camertius, were sent into Greece, to learn the laws of the Grecians, and laws of the Athenians, and other cities of Greece, and the same to bring to them to Rome. There wait then emassage when Atticus and Tarpinus were Consul, and three years after returned with the said laws whiche Sextus Quinctilius were Consuls. Now when the Tribunes were instant & called him upon them, to begin once for to make these laws, lawing and now already App. Claudius and T. Geminus were elected Cof. for this year: they paid assent of the Senat (according to the same law, App. Claudius) That other magistracies should forecease, and so Decemviri were created in consular, by roial authority, without liberty of appealing from them to the people: who should enact as well out of their own customs and ordinances as the laws of the Grecians, the best & most profitable to the commonwealth, and let down the rights of the people of Rome. And look what they presented and presented (if the Senat and people of Rome allowed thereof) that should stand in force & bind the whole body of the state for ever. When this act was approved by the Commons, the Consul's reigned and gave over. In which dead, were chosen Decemviri consular, namely, App. Claudius, T. Geminus, the time that gave up their Consulship: Sp. Postumius, Serv. Sulpicius Camertius (those that were in consular, from the Cof. to Athens) T. Romulus, C. Julius, P. Seftius, Pub. Horatius, all men of consular calling, and such as had been Consuls before. Pedanius Sp. Veitinus, according to Livy, Dionysius, and Dionysius: although Therastus called Postumius by the name of Publius and not Spurius as Livy, and Dionysius do. Likewise Livy forenameth Pedanius, Flaccus; Dionysius Titus; but Dionysius and the Capitoline stones, Spurius. These Decemviri began their government in the 301 year after the foundation of the City, as Livy writeth, and after them Cassiodorus poeth. But the avouchers of the Capitol records, say it was the year 302, & with this agreeeth Veitinus, but Varro (who Orosius followeth) accounteth the year 303. Therein in judgment and admitted justice to the people by turns every one his tenth day on which day the said chief justice bare the sovereign port, with his 12 Licitors before him; the other nine had but one sergeant apiece to give attendance: and the singular concord among themselves, which otherwises was an agreement profitable when they were private, proved exceeding great equity to others.

BY this time the Commons, besides that they detested the name of Coss, no less than KK, found no mis of the Tribuns assitants; nor fought once after it. seeing the Decemvirs yeeld one onto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons: there were created for this year also Decemvirs in Consuls authority absolutely without appeal. Ap. Claudius the second time. Q. Fabius who had been four times Consul, M. Cornelius Maluginensis brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Consul in the year 295; M. Sergius, L. Minutius, T. Anthonius Merenda, M. Rabuleius: and three likewise of the Commons, Q. Petilius, K. Duilius, and Sp. Oppim Cornicenus; as witnesseth Diodorus Dionysius, and Livy; although the gentile names for the most part are by Diodorus omitted.

WHen the more part of the former year was past, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to do, (in case the said tables were once in the high court and assembly of the Centuries passed) why the common-weal should have any need of the Decemvirs, inasmuch as the commons expected, that soon after, the solemn court and assembly aforesaid for creation of Consuls should be published: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or assembly, came abroad guarded with whole troops of young gentlemen Patritians, and demeaned themselves more proudly and insolently to every man. But before the year was fully expired, by occasion of the lecherous lust of Ap. Claudius, who challenged a maiden (one of the commons daughters) as a bond-servant, according as Livy more at large writeth: and also of the commons insurrection and departing into the Aventine, the foresaid Decemvirs gave over their Magistracy: and when Q. Furius the high Pontifex called a general assembly of the tribes, ten Tribuns of the Commons were again chosen: and so at length in another assembly of Centuries for the Consuls, holden by the Interregent, created there were Consuls,

L. Valerius Potitus, M. Horatius Barbatus.

THEse Consuls Onuphris casteth upon a third year of the Decemvirs (although Livy seemeth to dissent) to the end that he might jump with the account of the Capitol, which he supposed to be collected by Varro: for by their calculation the triumphs of these Consuls declared in the Capitol records, are engraven upon this very year, 304: so as it appeareth evidently, that part of this year was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Consuls. Tacitus and Rufus write, that the Decemvirs continued but two years.

Livy putteth down for Consuls, Sp. Herminius and T. Virginium Calpurnianus. Cassiodorus saith, L. Herminius and T. Virginium. Dionysius writeth adon isphidion. Tiro isphidion: and Diodorus thus adon isphidion, adon isphidion isphidion: the Greek words, Herminius, Tricostrus: whereby Onuphris seareth that he is corruptly written in Diodorus, Servilius for Tricostrus: for Servilius was a surname of the Servilii and not of the Virginii. As for his colleague Herminius, that he is to be fore-named Lars, besides Diodorus and Dionysius, Valerius also sheweth in his tenth book, where he writeth thus: The fore-name of Lars is derived from the Lares.

M. Geganus Macerinus, C. Julius.

THEse are recorded likewise to be the Consuls this year. The surname Macerinus is suppressed by Cassiodorus and Diodorus, who also nameth the other L. Julius. In Dionysius certain pages be wanting in this place, Cassianus his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Macrinus.

T. Quintus Capitolinus IIII, Agrippa Furius.

Dionysius and Livy both, name the Coss, of this year, T. Quintus Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius. Diodorus and Cassiodorus conceal the surname and the numeral note of four. The Greek records have Furius and Capitolinus, Onuphris unto Furius addeth the surnames of the grandfire, to wit, Agrippinus Furius.

M. Genucius, C. Curtius.

Livy delivereth unto us for Coss, this year, M. Genucius, and P. Curtius. Cassiodorus likewise M. Genucius and P. Curtius: but Dionysius, M. Genucius and C. Quintus: and Diodorus hath, M. Genucius and Agrippa Curtius Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him Onuphris have noted, it is falsely read in Livy, Curtius for Curtius: and that is proved by the authority of Varro de lingua latina: and therefore in the Sicilian registers written they are, Genucius and Curtius.

L. Semp. Atratinus, M. Papius Crassus.
L. Clodius, M. Papius Crassus.
L. Atilius, M. Papius Crassus.

WHen C. Canuleius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former year published a second second law, That one of the Consuls should be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignity of the Patritii was empaiied) the nobles leaving left the said law would pa in deed mangle their heads, drew to a point: whereof C. Claudius made the first motion and was the adviser, That in stead of Consuls there should be created military Tribuns, three of the Patritii, and as many of the Commons: who being endued with Consular authority, should govern the common-weal. Also, that when their years government was expired, the advice both of Senat and also of people should be once again required. Whether they would have Consuls rather than Tribunes consular? and look which pleased them, they should be created. These points being resolved upon and decreed, three military Tribunes were created only, all Patritii: and well enough were the Commons content therewith, because themselves were eligible and capable of that dignity. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly set up, stood not firmly established. For within 3 months after, by a decree of the Angurs, they resigned up their honourable place, as if there had been some error committed in their election: and then T. Quintus Barbaus (nominated Interregent) created Consuls, L. Papius Mugillanus, and L. Semp. Atratinus. The Consuls are left out in the Sicilian registers. Well saith Livy therefore, that these Consuls are found neither in ancient annals and yearly records, nor yet in the Kalender of the Magistrats. But Cicero maketh mention of them in his Epistle to Papirius Pater.

M. Geganus Macerinus II, T. Quintus Capitolinus V.

Dionysius and Cassiodorus avouch these for Consuls this year. As for Dionysius, he saith that they entred in the month of December, Cassius concealeth both their surnames, and Diodorus the one, namely, Capitolinus. The Greek records have Macerinus the second time, and Capitolinus the fifth time. Zonarus nameth them Macerinus and Barbaus.

M. Fab. Vibulanus, Postumus Eburnus Cornicenus.

Livy saith, that Consuls of this year, were so named, Diodorus and Cassiodorus are silent in their surnames. The Greek records have Vibulanus and Helma. Diodorus attributeth to Eburnus the surname of BARC, but what manner of addition that might be, Sigonius knoweth not, and thinketh that it should be read, BARC.

C. Furius Pacilus, M. Papius Crassus.

THEse Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus are in this wise represented unto us. But by Diodorus after this sort, Q. Furius Fufus, and M. Papius Crassus. And by the Greek records thus, Pacilus and Crassus.

P. Geganus Macrinus, L. Menenius Lanatus.
L. Iunus and Cassiodorus, deliver these Consuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganus Macrinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus. Diodorus, L. Menenius, and Proculus Geganus Macrinus. The Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Lanatus.

T. Quintus Capitolinus VI, A. Menenius Lanatus.

BY Livy and Cassiodorus, these were the Consuls for this year: but after Dionysius, T. Quintus, and T. Menenius. According to the Sicilian rolls, Menenius and Capitolinus.

M. Aemilius, M. Papius Crassus.
L. Quintus son of Circumstantis, M. Papius Crassus.
L. Iulius, M. Papius Crassus.

THE Tribuns of the Commons imported and prevailed, that there should be an election holden for Tribunes military, rather than Consuls: making no doubt, but in the choosing of six (for so many now by law might be created) some of the commons by making profession that they would be revenged for the death of Meles, would step into the place: so wbeit the Commons created no more than three Tribuns with Consular authority, and among them L. Quintus the son of Circumstantis. In which election, M. Aemilius, a right honorable man and of great worth, was by their suffrages preferred before Quintus and Julius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribunes military for this year: but in this sort, M. Aemilius Mamerctus, C. Iulius, and L. Quintus.

M. Geganus Macerinus III, L. Sergius Fidenas.

WHen the Commons, together with their Tribuns were quiet, and carefully regarded the main state of the Common-weal, no question there was not controversy, but that Coss, were chosen, to wit, M. Geganus Macrinus the third time, and L. Sergius, so saith Livy, Cassiodorus doth the same, but that he setteth down the names of the Coss, only in this wise, M. Geganus the third time, and L. Sergius, without surnames. Diodorus likewise, M. Geganus and L. Sergius, Cassianus Kalender, and the Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Fidenas. For this Sergius was surnamed Fidenas (as Livy reporteth) by occasion of the war which he made against the Fidenas.

M. Cornelius Maluginensis, L. Papius Crassus.

Livy and Cassiodorus report these above-named, for this year Consuls, Diodorus nameth them, L. Papius and A. Corn. Macerinus: but doubtless not without error, as Sigonius supposed: for both in Cassianus Kalender and the rolls of Sicily, we find Maluginensis and Crassus.

C. Julius II. I. Virginis.

These Consuls are found for this year in Livy and Cassiodorus; but in Diodorus C. Julius and Proculus Virginis Tricipitinus. In Capitoline Kalender and the Sicilian records, Julius and Virginis.

C. Julius III. } or M. Manlius.
L. Virginis III. } or Q. Manlius.

I find in Licinius Macer, that the same Consuls were chosen again for the year following, to wit, Julius the third time, and Virginis the second. Valerius Antias and Quintus. Tubero alleged for these years Consuls, M. Manlius, and Q. Sulpicius. But in these so different records of theirs, Tubero and Macer both profess to go by the linen books; and neither of them dissembleth but that the ancient writers report of military Tribunes that year created. As for Licinius, he doubteth not to follow those linen records, and Tubero cannot relolve of the truth. But among other things, which by continuance of time are unknown, this also is left uncertain. Thus much Livy. But Diodorus in stead of Consuls, setteth down three military Tribunes, namely, M. Manlius, Q. Sulpicius Pretorianus, and Servius Cornelius Cossus. The Greek records (following Antias and Tubero) have delivered to us Consuls, Capitolinus and Camatinus.

321
M. Fabius Vibulanus, } Tribunes military
Sergius Eidenas, } in Consuls authority.
Maecius Fostius.

The Tribunes of the Commons in their orations continually forbidd the elections of Consuls: and when they had brought it so about; that the government was at the point of interregency, they wan the mastery in the end, that the military Tribunes might be chosen with Consular authority. But reward of this victory which they thot at, namely, to have a commoner created, they obtained none: for out of the Patritii, namely M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Fostius, L. Sergius Eidenas. Thus much Livy. Diodorus likewise nameth three, but corruptly, to wit, M. Fabius, M. Calpurnius, and L. Servilius. As for Fostius in some of the Capitol monuments, he is written Elicinator and not Fostius, as in the common editions of Livy, whom Diodorus calleth pativius.

322
L. Panarius Mamercus, } Tribunes military
L. Furius Medullinus, } in Consuls authority.
Sp. Posthumus Albus.

No motion was made of Consuls election. So Tribunes military were created in Consuls authority these, Panarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Spurius Posthumus Albus:

as Livy writeth. In Diodorus they are named thus, L. Furius Sp. Panarius Mamercus.

323
T. Quintius Cincinnatus, } Cincinnatus Pennus
Julius Mento.

An act of the Senat passed, that an election of Consuls should be holder, wherein T. Quintius, [son of Lucius] Cincinnatus, furnished also Pennus, and C. Julius Mento, were made Consuls, saith Livy. The same Cons. Cassiodorus also avoucheth. The Greek records have Pennus and Mento: But Diodorus nameth them barely T. Quintius and Cains Julius.

L. Papirius Crassus, L. Julius.

The Tribunes of the Commons made much ado, and kept a convailing in the City that Tribunes military in Consuls authority should be created, but could not prevail. So Consuls were chosen, L. Papirius Crassus and L. Julius. So saith Livy and Cassiodorus: but Diodorus nameth them fallily, Cains Papirius and L. Junius: the Greek records, Crassus and Julius.

325
L. Ser. Eidenas II. Hostius Lucretius Tricipitinus

The Consuls this year in Cassiodorus, are L. Sergius and Hostius Lucretius: in Diodorus Opter Lucretius and L. Sergius Eidenas in Livy. L. Sergius Eidenas the second time, and Hostius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In the Sicilian registers, Tricipitinus and Eidenas. Of these Valerius maketh mention in his Epitome.

A. Cornelius Cossus. T. Quintius Pennus II.

These Consuls are named by Livy and Cassiodorus for this year. But Diodorus avoucheth as L. Quintius and Sempronius; but corruptly, as Siginius and Onuphrius suppose. For in the Sicilian records are written, Cossus and Pennus, the surnames of Cornelius and Quintius. Of these Consuls Livy spake before, in the year 316.

327
C. Servilius Ahala. L. Papirius Mugillanus

Livy and Cassiodorus, name Consuls for this year, C. Servilius Ahala, and L. Papirius Mugillanus. Diodorus for Ahala, putteth down Servilius: for well it may be, that Servilius was also called Ahala.

328
T. Quintius Pennus, } Tribunes military in
M. Posthumus. } Cons. authority.
C. Furius.
A. Cornelius Cossus.

The Commons carried it clear, that no Consuls this year were created: for four there were elected military Tribunes in Consuls authority, namely, T. Quintius Pennus immediately upon his Consulship, M. Posthumus, C. Furius, & A. Cornelius Cossus. Thus writeth Livy: and the same Diodorus nameth.

329
A. Sempronius Atratinus, } Tribunes Military in L. Quintius Cincinnatus, } Cons. authority.
L. Furius Medullinus.
L. Herennius Barbatus.

These abovenamed (as Livy reporteth) were Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames, and L. Herennius full and whole.

330
Ap. Claud, the Decemvirs son, } Tribunes military in Cons.
Sp. Nannius Rusticus, } suls authority.
L. Sergius Eidenas, }
Sext. Julius Julius.

These Tribunes military in Cons. authority Livy setteth down for this year. The same doth Diodorus also nominate, all but their surnames, and App. Claudianus whom he called Tullus. Livy moreover saith, that there were two Spurius Nannius Rusticus. Tribunes in those diest but no doubt, as Onuphrius thinketh, there is some error in the copies of the book: the one who is now the first time and a second time shall be in the year 338; the other, who was first in the year 335, and once again in the year 330. The Capitol monuments of stone have the same: but they shew that the one was but once, and the other thrice Tribune.

331
C. Sempronius Atratinus. Q. Fabius Vibulanus

The Consuls this year created were according to Livius and Cassiodorus, C. Sempronius Atratinus and Q. Fabius Vibulanus (Diodorus overpasseth them) whom Livy reporteth to have entered into government, upon the Ides of December. Of C. Sempronius Atratinus Consul, Valerius writeth six book, cap. 9. whom he forenameth Lucius: but in the third book and second chapter, he speaketh of both, although untrue; for Q. Fabius, he nameth Q. Catalus.

332
L. Manlius Capitolinus, } Tribunes military in
Q. Fabius Arundinus, } Consuls authority.
L. Papirius Mugillanus.
L. Servilius Serranus.

The Senat being offended with the very name of Consuls for the hatred they bare to Sempronius, commanded Tribunes military to be created with Consuls authority. And these they were, L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Arundinus, and Papirius Mugillanus. Thus much Livy, in whose story the name is mistaking of the fourth, to wit, L. Servilius Serranus, who in the year 337, is found engraven in the Capitol stones, Tribunes military the second time. Of these, Diodorus saith not a word. In a fragment of the Capitoline marble, there is to be seen the surnames of Mugillanus, belonging to L. Papirius.

T. Quintius Capitolinus. N. Fabius Vibulanus.

Not only Livy, but Cassiodorus also recordeth that the Consuls this year were N. Fabius Vibulanus and T. Quintius Capitolinus. Diodorus overpasseth them; but do not the Sicilian registers. In a fragment of the Capitol marbles, we find engraven T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the son of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the 300 Fabii slain in Cremera, survived and was the first of all that kindred and family surnamed Nannius: as Valerius Maximus in his 10 book, and Sext. Pompeius do report. As for T. Quintius son he was (as Livy writeth) to that Capitolinus who was Consul six times.

An Interregency.

When the greater part of the year was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Trib. of the Commons and certain Interregents, while the Tribunes one while would not suffer the Patritii to go together about the declaring of an interregent, and another while impeached the Interregent that he could not passe an act of the Senat for the election of Consuls rat length L. Papirius Mugillanus the Interregent, by rebuking as well the Senators as the Tribunes of the Commons prevailed, that an assembly should be holden for chusing of Tribunes consular. So there were created Tribunes military with Consuls authority, and all Patritii, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratinus. Thus much Livy.

335
A. Menenius Lanatus, } Trib. military in Cons.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, } authority.
Sp. Nannius.
C. Servilius.

Military Tribunes with Consuls authority for this year, are set down by Livy Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and P. Nannius: for the name of the fourth wanting; and that was C. Servilius, son of Quintius and nephew of Cains, forenamed Axilla; who the year following, in the Capitol tables is numbered among the Tribunes consular, with the numeral note of II. So as it muil needs be, that he was the first time in the year, for as much as no other fit void place left for him. Diodorus nameth Sp. Veturius.

Valerius C. Terentius, L. Menenius, C. Sulpitius, T. Papirius, L. Emilius, M. Fabius.

P. Manlius, C. Sexilius.
C. Manlius, M. Albinus.
L. Julius, L. Antistius.

After this, was the general assembly holden for the election of military Tribunes in Consuls authority, wherein were as many created of the Commoners as of the Patritians; namely, P. and C. both Manlius, with L. Julius, Patritians: and out of the Commons, C. Sexilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. But Diodorus exhibiteth eight, and to these above rehearsed, he addeth C. Horencius, and P. Trebonius, Sexilius also he calleth Sextius.

376
Sp. Furius, P. C. Cilius.
Q. Servilius I. M. Horatius.
C. Licinius, L. Geganius.

Livy reporteth these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year: but in Livy, for Lu. Menenius the third time, you must read C. Licinius, as Sigonius hath shewed in his Scholia upon Livy: which Onuphrius also in his Kalender appereth. But Diodorus speaketh of no more than four: Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Cilius.

377
L. Emilius, Ser. Sulpitius.
P. Valerius IV. L. Quintus Cincinnatus.
C. Furius, C. Quintus Cincinnatus.

These Tribunes military, the Consuls (being forced by the might and strong hand of the great men of the City) chose all Patritians, as Livy witnesseth. The same also are named by Diodorus, excepting only C. Quintus, who is called by him C. Cornelius. As for Ser. Sulpitius, he was surname Plautius, Zonaras nameth him Rufus.

378. 379. 380. 381. 382.
C. Licinius Stolo, Tribunes of the Commons five years.
L. Sextius.

In this year hapned the fourth change of the Roman government: for the administration of the weal publicke, tell from Tribunes military in consuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livy reporteth) C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and against the power of the Patritii, the first for redressing of debts: a second for a limit of lands and possessions: & the third, that there should be no more elections of Tribunes military, and that one of the consuls should necessarily be chosen a commoner: seeing they could not go through with these laws, by reason of their own fellows oppositions (whom of purpose the Nobles had made for themselves) fell into an anger, and would suffer no cruel Magistrates of State to be created, nor any election to be holden, but only of Aediles and Tribunes, both of commons. This desolate estate and want of Magistrates (whiles the commons made the same Tribunes still, who with uncessant and invincible persistence never gave over to cross the election of Tribunes military) continued in the city for the space of five years, as Livy saith. This want of Magistrates Diodorus calleth anagxia, and casteth it upon the former year. But Sex. Rufus, Eutropius, C. Cassiodorus, and Zonaras write that they ruled the state not five years, but four only. Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender, follow Livy, & his Annals it seemeth that the Capitoline writers go by Livy also in the sixteenth book, and four and fortieth chapter, maketh mention of the year three hundred seventy nine from the foundation of the city, in which year he saith that at Rome

L. Furius, Ser. Cornelius.
A. Manlius, P. Valerius.
Ser. Sulpitius, C. Valerius.

When C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their opposition and the liberty of their negative voice, whereby the Interregent called and held an assembly for the election of Magistrates, the above-named Tribunes military, were (as Livy saith) created for this year. Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Menenius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpast and gone then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Ser. Sulpitius, and Ser. Cornelius. But in his story, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out same, there is a confusion of yearly Magistrates.

384
Q. Servilius, M. Cornelius.
C. Furius, I. I. Q. Quintus.
A. Cornelius, M. Fabius.

This year also, as Livy writeth, had these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority. But Diodorus hath Q. Servilius, C. Furius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and M. Fabius: as for Quintus, Sigonius calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitoline. The rest have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found Cossus, M. Maluginensis, C. Cincinnatus, M. Fabius Ambustus. This is that M. Fabius Ambustus, who had bestowed his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Stolo, the other to Ser. Sulpitius Plautius, as Livy writeth.

L. Quintus, Ser. Cornelius.
Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius.
L. Papirius, L. Veturius.

Livy declareth these six for Tribunes military this year. Diodorus rehearseth but three, namely, L. Quintus, Servilius Cornelius, and Servius Sulpitius. What surnames all these carried, and with what numerall notes (signifying how often they had born the office) they are to be marked, the Capitoline fragments do shew; wherein they stand thus, Capitoline, M. Maluginensis, I. I. Præstatum, I. I. I. I. Sp. Servilius Strabatus, L. Papirius Crassus, L. Veturius Crassus Cicurius.

Two Dictators without any cruel Magistrates of State besides.

Presently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the trial of a small issue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindered by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all haste betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge, the foreign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen, L. Emilius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livy writeth) resigned up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who likewise avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created, Livy saith, it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the General of the horse. Howbeit, they mean not both, one and the self-same man. For Livy saith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune military in Consuls authority before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the sedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the foresaid sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com, the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com, and General of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have been the son of P. Licinius C. C. military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius, who of the Com, was the first Tribune military. Of this, see more in his Kalender.

A. Cornelius I. I. M. Cornelius.
L. Veturius, M. Geganius.
Julius P. Manlius, P. Valerius V. I.

Livy exhibiteth these Trib. military before named for this year, whom Diodorus overspaleth. Their surnames, together with the notes signifying how often they had born this honourable dignity, are thus expressed in the Capitoline fragments, Cossus I. I. Maluginensis II. M. Accerius. L. Veturius Crassus Cicurius II. P. Valerius C. C. Poplicola V. I. P. Manlius Capitolinus II.

L. Sextius, L. Emilius.

When L. Sextius and C. Licinius Trib. of the Com. now chosen the tenth time, were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictator and Senat, was conquered by the strong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed, notwithstanding all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn assembly for election of Consuls: and that, (by virtue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which means, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, inasmuch as the Commons were at the point of insurrection and ready to leave the City: the discord & dissension was at length taken up and appeased by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Consul, so the Commons granted unto the nobles one Prætor or Lord chief Justice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was, that two Aediles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Consulship upon L. Sextius (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Emilius Mamercus, thus much Livy and Plutarch: who altogether with Cassiodorus put down for Coss. L. Emilius a Patritian, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same, Diodorus nameth Lu. Emilius Mamercus, and Lu. Læranus. Now this Læranus is the surname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoli, wherein the consuls are thus to be seen, Mamercus & L. Sextius Sextinus Læranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercus and Læranus. In the book entituled De viris illustribus of famous men, we find written that it was not L. Sextius, but C. Licinius Stolo, who was the first consul chosen out of the commonalty.

L. Genutius, Q. Servilius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus shew unto us for consuls, L. Genutius and Q. Servilius: Of whom Orosius also and Eutropius make mention. According to the records of the Capitoli, the consular first consularship is thus written. Q. Servilius of Q. nephew of Quintus Albus. Tit. 2 together together with L. Genucius, but in the second, the son of M. Genucius of Cn. Amintinus. In the Sicilian registers they be written Genucius and Curvius, but corruptly as Sigonius thinketh.

C. Sulpitius Peticus. C. Licinius Stolo.

These be the Consuls reported by Livy and Cassiodorus, Diodorus concealth their surnames, Valerius Max. in his second book and first cha. maketh mention of them, and so doth Plutarch in his problems. But he whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominat Calvus: as also the Sicilian, which deliver their surnames Paticus and Calvus.

L. Aemilius Mamercinus II. Cn. Genucius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare these for Consuls: whom Diodorus in his sixteenth book nameth Cn. Genucius and L. Aemilius. In the Capitol tables in this manner they be set down. . . . Mamercinus II. and Cn. Genucius son of M. and nephew of M. Amintinus. But in the Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Stola.

Q. Servilius Ahala II. L. Genucius II.

Diodorus nameth the Consuls of this year, Q. Servilius and Q. Genucius. The Sicilian registers Ahala and Genucius. Livy and Cassiodorus, Q. Servilius Hala and L. Genucius. These are they who three years before were matched together in the same government.

393
C. Sulpitius. C. Licinius Calvus.

These are by Livy recorded Consuls this year. Cassiodorus writeth them thus, C. Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius. Diodorus in this wise, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Sigonius supposeth they be the same, who three years before were Collegues. The Sicilian registers give unto Livinus the surname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo: and Sulpitius their surname Paticus.

394
C. Postellus Libo. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livy, and Cassiodorus write the Consuls for this year were, C. Postellus Balbus: and M. Fabius Ambustus. But Diodorus, M. Fabius and C. Postellus, corruptly for Postellus. The Capitoline writers give them surnames divers from Livy: for they call Libo, Visulus; but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian registers go with those of the Capitol.

M. Popilius Lenas. Cn. Manlius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name this year Consuls in this sort: but Diodorus calleth them, M. Popilius Lenas, and Cn. Manlius Imperatorius. This was the first man of the Popili, surnamed Lenas. The reason of which name Cicero rendereth in his book Brutus, saying, M. Popilius being Consul, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lenas, for that he was Flaminio Carmentis, upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and risen in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attire and habit as he was into the assembly: and what with his authority of countenance, and what with his eloquence of speech, appeased the sedition.

C. Fabius. C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this year: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Plantius. In the Capitoline records, . . . Ambustus and C. Plantius Proculus.

397
C. Martius. Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus name the Consuls of this year, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn. Manlius was Consul the first time, two years before. Cuspinianus book and the Greek records have Rutilius and Capitolinus.

M. Fabius Ambustus II. M. Popilius Lenas II.

This years Consuls are with these names entituled by Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames and the numerall leaveth out their surnames and the numerall records, Cuspinianus book and the Greek records, set them thus down, Ambustus II. and Lenas.

C. Sulpitius Peticus III. M. Valerius Poplicola.

In the four hundred year from the foundation of the City, and the thirtieth year after that it was by the Gauls won, the commons after eleven years did forgo their hold of the Consulship, and upon an Interregency, both Coss. of the Patritii entred into government, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus III. M. Valerius Publicola, as Livy saith. The same Consuls Diodorus, Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian registers do report. But why the account of time made by Livy, disagreeeth from this reckoning, Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender do give a reason.

M. Fab. Ambustus III. T. Quint. or M. Popilius.

In this year also, according to Livy, both Coss. were Patritii, namely, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, with T. Quintus: although he writeth, that in some Annals instead of T. Quintus, he found Marcus Popilius Consul. With Livy accordeth Diodorus, and Cassiodorus, Solinus also, who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was born when M. Fabius Ambustus, and T. Quintus

Titus Capitolinus were Consuls. Cuspinianus book setteth forth Ambustus and Capitolinus. But these Consuls and those that follow are in the Sicilian registers concealed.

C. Sulpitius Peticus III. M. Valer. Poplicola III.

Both Consuls created this year were Patritii, and namely, those who are heretofore set down, after Livy and Cassiodorus, Diodorus omitteth both their surnames, and also the numerall notes, and setteth after the former Consuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius Poplicola. C. Martius Rutilius.

To L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Martius Rutilius of the commons, as Livy saith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutilius the second time, Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingle them confusedly with those of the next year, matching Rutilius and Pennis together.

C. Sulpitius Peticus. T. or K. or C. Quint. Pennus.

The Coss. for this year created were C. Sulpitius Peticus, and T. Quint. Pennus. Some put to Quintus the name C. also, others Caius. Livy and Cassiodorus name them thus, C. Sulpitius Peticus and T. Quintus Pennus: but Diodorus, C. Sulpitius and C. Quintus.

M. Popilius Lenas. L. Cornelius Scipio.

Livy writeth, that for Consuls this year the commons yielded M. Popilius Lenas, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Cassiodorus setteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lenas the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio. Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Popilius: and the Sicilian registers barely Scipio and Lenas.

L. Furius Camillus. P. Claudius Crassus.

Livius Fabius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possession of the Consulship: and being himself for that good merited created Consul, with the great love and hearty affection of the nobles, nominated for his Colleague, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus saith Livy. The same Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus. But Diodorus, nameth them Aemilius and T. Quintus. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Crassus. Cicero in Caio maketh mention of these Consuls, saying, that Plato came to Tarentum, when L. Camillus and P. Claudius were Consuls: Gellius likewise, in book 11 chapter.

M. Valerius Corvus. M. Popilius Lenas III.

Marcus Manlius Torquatus being Dictator, declared for Consul with the exceeding favour of the people, M. Valerius Corvus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, and being but three and twenty years old. This Corvus had joyned with him in the Consulship from out of the commons, M. Popilius Lenas the third time, as saith Livy and Cassiodorus. But Diodorus three years after nominateth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitol only it is found, M. Valerius, M. F. M. N. Corvus Consul. In the Sicilian registers Corvus and Lenas.

T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus nameth them for Consuls this year, Cuspinianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Torquatus and Venus. In a fragment of the Capitol there is to be read the surname of Manlius Imperatorius Torquatus.

M. Valerius Corvus II. C. Patellus.

These are named Consuls by Livy, and Cassiodorus: but Cuspinianus Kalender and the registers of Sicily shew for Consuls, Corvus and Libo. As for the name C. Patellus, it is described by his Dictatorship, which (according to the Capitol evidences) he bare in the year 440: for in a fragment (testifying his Consulship) there appeareth no more but one of his surnames, Visulus.

M. Fabius Dorso. Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus.

These were the Consuls created for this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. Diodorus also (although not in the right place) alleateth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulpitius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dorso and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patritii, which Livy omitted.

C. Mart. Rutilius III. T. Manlius Torquatus II.

Livy and Cassiodorus avow these for Coss. This year, Diodorus likewise delivereth unto us, C. Martius and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers, Rutilius and Torquatus. Frontinus also in his second book of Stratagems speaketh of them.

411
M. Valerius Corvus III. A. Cornelius Cassus. Livy and Cassiodorus both together report, that these were chosen Coss. for this year. Diodorus, Cicero in his book of Divination, and Frontinus, name them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Valerius and Cassius: both of them are Patritii. But he that hath written of famous men, calleth them, Valerius Max. and Cornelius Cassus.

412
C. Marius Rutilius IV. Q. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare Coss. for this year, C. Marius and Q. Servilius, Diodorus, Q. Servilius and Marius Rutilius. The Sicilian registers, Abala and Rutilius. This is that Q. Servilius Abala who was Master of the horle in the 403 year.

C. Plantius II. L. Emilius Mamercinus.

He Consuls that followed, were C. Plantius the second time, and L. Emilius Mamercinus as witness Livy and Cassiodorus; but L. Emilius & C. Plotius, as testifieth Diodorus; and as the Sicilian registers say, Venno and Mamercinus. Cuspinians Kalender set forth for this year, Venno the second time, and Mamercinus.

414
T. Manlius Torquatus III. P. Decius Mus.

Titus Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus, bare the Consulship this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus report, Diodorus nameth them, T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, Torquatus and Mus. Zonaras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Pliny speaketh in his 22 book and 5 chap. Valerius also in his 1 book and 5 chap, besides others.

415
T. Emilius Mamercinus. Q. Publilius Philo.

Titus Emilius Mamercinus, and Q. Publilius Philo, are by Livy reckoned Coss. for this year, Diodorus passeth over their surnames. The Greek records shew unto us, Mamercinus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll.

416
L. Furius Camillus. C. Manius.

Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus hath L. Furius and Camillus, but corruptly The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Menius. The Capitoll monuments of triumphs, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Menius. Pliny in his 34 book and 5 cha, maketh mention of Caius Menius, Consul.

417
C. Sulpitius Longus. P. Elvius Pains.

Livy and Cassiodorus write, that these Coss. followed, Diodorus putteth down C. Sulpitius, and L. Pappius. The Sicilian registers, have Longus and Pains.

418
L. Pappius Crassus. K. Dintius.

Lucius Pappius Crassus, and K. Dintius, were this years Coss., as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Crassus. In the Sicilian registers they are named, Crassus and Dintius. As touching these Consuls, Cicero in his Epistle to Pains, writeth thus, L. Pappius Crassus, four years after he was Dictator, was made Consul with K. Dintius.

M. Valerius Corvus III. M. Atilius Regulus.

This year, when the Aulones that inhabited the City Cales, took arms and combined with the Sidicins, M. Valerius Corvus, a right noble General, was created Consul the fourth time, having to his Colleague (as Livy writeth) M. Atilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consuls; and so doth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appear extant in the Sicilian registers.

T. Veturius. Sp. Posthumius.

The Dictator held an assembly for the election of Consuls, wherein were created (according to Livy) these above-named. So say Cassiodorus also and Diodorus. Zonaras nameth them Tiber. Calvinius, and Sp. Posthumius: and right well, as Sigonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Veturii. The Greek records, and Cuspinians book, have Albinus and Calvinius.

Interregens, all one year.

Sigonius and Onuphrius infer this one year without Consuls, besides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they see neither in Livy, nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totall sum collected by Varro. And that the said year should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M. Valerius Corvus Consul the fourth time, in the year of the City 419, and again L. Emilius and C. Plantius in the year 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Emilius the Consul should fall upon the year 414, and the totall should fall upon in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Halaondar (who left in writing a Chronology of the Consuls) saw long before them; for he over-passed this year wholly, noted without Consuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-weal without Consuls, or other Magistrates of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livy writeth,

422
A. Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Albus Cornelius the second time Coss. with Cn. Domitius is by Livy and Cassiodorus set down down. Diodorus nameth them A. Cornelius and C. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calvinius and Cossus.

M. Claudius Marcellus. C. Valerius.

After this, were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. In Diodorus also they be set down by the name of C. Valerius, and M. Clodius. Livy saith, that he findeth in the Annals, the surnames of Valerius diversly put down, namely, Flaccus and Potius. Orofius calleth these Consuls, Claudius Marcellus, and Valerius Flaccus: The Sicilian registers, Potius and Marcellus. Sigonius and Onuphrius retain their surnames, that it may seem, how to the old surname Potius of the House Valeria, this new surname of Flaccus is a later addition.

L. Pappius Crassus II. L. Plantius Venno.

These Consuls are by Livy and Cassiodorus recited this year, Diodorus concealeth their surnames. The Sicilian registers, make them known by the names of Crassus and Venno.

L. Emilius Mamercinus. C. Plantius.

Next to them (according to Livy and Cassiodorus) were L. Emilius Mamercinus, and C. Plantius created Consuls, Diodorus nominateth L. Pappius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll do evidently shew. These Consuls entred upon their government the first day of July.

P. Plautius Proculus. P. Cornelius Scapulus.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down [for Consuls] P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapulus. Diodorus P. Cornelius and A. Posthumius. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Scipio. Onuphrius thinketh this Plautius ought to be forenamed not Publius but Caius: who in his Consulship which he bare afterwards with Appius Cacus, was surnamed Venox (as Frontinus supposeth) for finding certain springs and veins of water within the earth.

427
C. Plautius Proculus. Q. Publilius Philo II.

Livy and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulship for this year, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publilius Philo. Diodorus L. Cornelius and Q. Publilius. The Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Philo.

428
L. Pappius Magillanus Cursor. C. Paterius.

Caius Paterius and L. Pappius are by Livy, nominated consuls this year, C. Paterius the third time, and L. Pappius Magillanus, by Cassiodorus. Solinus maketh mention of these Consuls in his five and thirtieth chapter. As for Pappius, Livy indeed turneth him here Magillanus, but he saith that he findeth him in other Annals by the name of Cursor. In the Greek records they be Libo and Cursor. Now as touching C. Paterius, he is to be written with the numerall note II, and not III, as Sigonius and Onuphrius do admonish. For it is not the same man who was Consul in the 323 year, but his son.

429

Livy and Cassiodorus put down for consuls, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Scæva. Diodorus, L. Furius, and D. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus.

Lucius Furius, unto whom the charge of Sannius fell by lot, fortun'd by occasion of sickness to forgo the war there, and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martial affairs a Dictator; whereupon he pronounced L. Pappius Cursor, the bravest warrior in those daies; by whom Q. Fabius Maximus was named great Master of the horle. Afterwards Cursor turned him out of that Masterhip of horle, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Sannits when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Aspicus anew: and in his room he substituted L. Pappius Crassus. Thus write Livy, Eutropius, and Valerius, in the second book.

C. Sulpitius Longus II. Q. Emilius [L. Anlus] Cerretanus.

Lucius Pappius the Dictator, before he left his Magistracy, created Consuls, C. Sulpitius Longus II, and Q. Emilius Cerretanus. Some Annals have Anlus. Thus much Livy, in like manner the Sicilian registers have Longus and cerretanus. But Diodorus corruptly for Anlus hath Alins.

432
Q. Fabius. L. Fulvius.

Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius; whom the Capitoll records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and L. Fulvius Corvus. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers, they are put down, Cursor and Sylla.

433
T. Veturius Calvinius. Sp. Posthumius.

This year Livy and Cassiodorus set forth for Consuls, T. Veturius Calvinius and Sp. Posthumius. Cicero in his third book of Offices writeth, that they were twice Coss. Zonaras collecteth callest the one of them T. Calpurnius, by a familiar forename unto that house and kindred of the Patulii. The Greek records exhibit unto us Calpurnius and Atinius. Of these Consuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his book of old age; Pliny also in his book of famous men; Gellius in his 17 book and 21 chap. Florus in his 1 book and 16 chap. and Orosius in his 3 book and 15 chap. do make mention.

L. Papirius Cursor II. C. Publilius Philo.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus shew for this year Consuls, Q. Publilius Philo and L. Papirius Cursor, the second time. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third time Consul, his Consulships do plainly shew.

435

L. Papirius Cursor for Mugillanus,
Q. Antius Corretanus II.

L. Ioy saith, there is some doubt, whether L. Papirius Cursor were this year created Consul the third time, with Q. Emilius Corretanus the second time: and for his good service in war at Luceria, continued still in government: or rather L. Papirius Mugillanus, and so the surname was mistaken. Cassiodorus delivereth unto us L. Papirius and Q. Antius Corretanus. The Sicilian registers, Papirius and corretanus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitol, alloweth of Cursor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cassianus hath set forth, following other Annals, setteth down Mugillanus.

M. Fostius Flaccinator. L. Plautius Vennio.

Being that fortwelve years next ensuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and found, the less trouble we need to be at in reforming and redressing the names of the Magistrats. Both they, and also Ioy with Cassiodorus represent unto us for this years consuls, M. Fostius Flaccinator and L. Plautius Vennio. Diodorus calleth them L. Plotius and Publius. The Sicilian registers, Vennio and Flaccus.

437

C. Junius Bubulcus. Q. Emilius Barbula.
Cassiodorus putteth down C. Junius and Q. Emilius for Consuls. Ioy, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Quintus Emilius Barbula. A stone in the Capitol, Q. Emilius Barbula, and C. Junius Bubulcus Bruns.

438

Sp. Nautius. M. Popilius.

Next follow in order Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius Consuls, according to Ioy and Cassiodorus. Rutilius and Lenus their surnames, are by Sigonius restored unto them: and the same also are to be seen in the Sicilian books of record.

439

L. Papirius Cursor III. Q. Publilius Philo III.

The Consuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livy's books, are there left out: namely, L. Papirius Cursor the fourth time, and Q. Publilius Philo likewise the fourth time: as it is written in Cassiodorus; in the Capitoll tables, and in Cassianus book, wherein they are named Cursor and Philo. Howbeit, in the Sicilian registers they are called Cursor and Lenus.

440

M. Patellus. C. Sulpitius.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus report for Consuls this year, C. Sulpitius and M. Patellus. But Diodorus hath C. Sulpitius and Publius. Corretanus corruptly for cursor. The Capitoline writers, have M. Patellus Libo and C. Sulpitius Longus the third time. The Sicilian registers, Longus and cursor. But there is a fault, as Sigonius truly thinketh.

441

L. Papirius Cursor IV. C. Junius Bubulcus.

Diodorus putteth down for Consuls this year L. Papirius fifth time, and C. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Bubulcus. But Ioy and Cassiodorus, L. Papirius Cursor IV. and C. Junius Bubulcus II. Festus maketh mention also of these Consuls in his 18 book.

M. Valerius. C. Decius.

L. Ioy writeth that there followed consuls M. Valerius Max, and P. Decius: but Cassiodorus, saith M. Valerius and P. Decius. Examinus in his book of water-conduits, speaketh of these Consuls: whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samnites war. As for P. Decius, Ioy afterwards calleth Max. The Sicilian registers have Max and Max.

443

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Emilius Barbula II.

We find in Ioy for Consuls this year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time: likewise in Cassiodorus. But Diodorus nameth them C. Junius and Q. Emilius. In the Sicilian registers, Bubulcus and Barbula. In the same names are also in the Capitoll monuments, which be in Ioy.

C. Martius Rutilius. Q. Fabius.

C. Martius Rutilius and Q. Fabius be this years Consuls in Ioy. But in Cassiodorus, C. Martius Rutilius and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus hath C. Martius and Q. Fabius the second time. The Sicilian registers shew Rutilius and and Rutilius. The Capitol monuments, Q. Fabius, Max, Rutilianus the second time, and C. Martius, who afterwards in his second Consulship in the 498 year, is surnamed Conserinus.

A year without Consuls, P. Papirius Dillator II.

Verrinus Flaccus interposeth this year also without Consuls, wherein he reporteth L. Papirius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Bubulcus Bruns, the Master of the horse. This year Diodorus, Ioy, the Greek records, Cassianus book and Cassiodorus do overlap. For Ioy writeth that L. Papirius Cursor was nominated by the consul Dictator, and by him C. Junius Bubulcus named Master of the horse: upon occasion that C. Martius the Cof, had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnitis. This inserting of one year Onuphrius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might stand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whose judgment we also are willing to follow.

Q. Fabius. P. Decius.

L. Ioy writeth, that Fabius continued Consul this year also, for his singular good service in subduing and taming Hetruria: and that he had for his companion in government Decius. Cassiodorus acknowledgeth for Cof, Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the second time. Diodorus, P. Decius and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers Mus and Rullus. The Capitoline tables, P. Decius Mus II. and Q. Fabius Max. Rullianus the third time.

447

App. Claudius. L. Volumninus.

L. Ioy saith, that immediately there followed Consuls, App. Claudius and L. Volumninus. Cassiodorus and Diodorus, Appius and Volens. The Sicilian registers, App. Claudius Cacius and L. Volumninus. The Capitoline monuments have Flaminius and Volens. Now whether one of these Consuls surnames be Volens or Violens, Onuphrius advertiseth us to consider. For the capitoll stone hath it always written Violens. But the Greek words have Appius and Rodius: as if the name were Violens.

448

Q. Martius Tremulus. P. Cornelius Arvina.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus register for the Consuls of this year, Q. Martius Tremulus, with a Colleague adjoined unto him, Diodorus saith Q. Martius and P. Cornelius. The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Arvina.

Decius Posthumius and T. Minutius are reported consuls by Diodorus, Ioy and Cassiodorus.

Cassianus book sheweth, Megellus and Angurinus. These Cof, doth L. Pij put down for to succeed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out those two years wherein we have let down (as Ioy writeth) that claudius with Volumninus, and Cornelius with Martius were consuls. Whether his memory failed him in digesting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overlapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline stone, which sheweth for this year, Megellus to be the surname of Posthumius, Tiberius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fabius. Now the surnames of Fabius were curvus and Petrinus, as it appeareth written in his triumph.

P. Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Saverrio.

The Consuls next following were P. Sulpitius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Ioy and Cassiodorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greek registers, they stand Sempronius and Saverrio. Pliny writeth of these Consuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus. Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Consulship there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

L. Gennatius. Ser. Cornelius.

Diodorus, Ioy and Cassiodorus report for Cof, this year, L. Gennatius, and Serius Cornelius. The Sicilian registers have Aventinensis and Lenulus. The Capitoline writers put unto Cornelius the surname of Lenulus.

M. Livius Denter. M. Emilius.

L. Ioy nameth for Consuls this year M. Livius and c. Emilius. Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Emilius. Diodorus, M. Livius and M. Emilius. As for the forename to Emilius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to be given unto Diodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Ioy there is mention made the year following of M. Emilius Paulus General of the horsemen, whom they all think to be the same man that this Consul, M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoll records, which surname Ioy in another place addeth to the Livy. Cassianus book in like manner setteth down Denter and Pantius as the surnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Denter and Emilius.

Two Dictators, and no Consul.

This year also of two Dictators without Consuls, Onuphrius inserteth in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects; which, which, if this year were over-slipped should be wholly overthrow: although Diadere, Livy, and Cassiodorus dissent therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Onuphrius more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

M. Valerius, Q. Apuleius Pansa.

Immediately after M. Livius and M. Aemilius, Livy, and Cassiodorus lettereth pass the year of two Dictators without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greek records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It seemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he saith that presently upon his Dictatorship he was made Col. Now that M. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

455
M. Fulvius Patens, T. Manlius Torquatus.

Livy, and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this year, M. Fulvius Patens and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers have Patens and Torquatus. Livy saith that Q. Fabius reitied the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlius the Consul, was by lot appointed to levy war against Hebrus, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entered into the enemies confines, but as he exercised among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cist from his back: whereupon (for the present) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Col. whom the Senat purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max. in his 7 book and 48 chap. to have been Col. now the first time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius saith they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Corvus.

L. Cornelius Scipio, Cn. Fulvius.

Cn. Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus: but Scipio and Centumalus, by Cyprianus book: Scipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

Livy and Cassiodorus alledge for Col. this year Q. Fabius Max. the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus thrice. The same Col. Cyprianus book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Consul,

458
L. Valerianus, Appius Claudius.

L. Valerianus a Commoner, and Appius Claudius of noble blood, were created Col. this year: even the same men who in their former Consulship were matched together: as Livy and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian registers they are found written, Claudianus and Valentinus. Howbeit, Cicero in his book entitled Ca. de re publica, that between the two Consulships of App. Claudius were ten years.

Q. Fabius V. P. Decius IV.

Livy and Cassiodorus both witness, that the Col. next following, were Q. Fabius the fifth time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Consulats and in one Censorship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus: of which Consuls Cicero speaketh very often; Valer. Max. likewise, Plutarch, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Eutropius, Orosius, and others: who all report, that the Col. P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

L. Postumius Megellus, M. Atilius Regulus.

The Col. next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, their surnames are Megellus and Regulus.

L. Papirius Cursor, Sp. Carvilius.

After Livy and Cassiodorus, the Col. this year were L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius. After the Sicilian registers, Cursor & Max. A none in the Capitol maketh mention of Papirius the son of L. nephew of P. (named Cursor), whom Livy writeth to be the son of Papirius 5 times Col. Of these Col. Pliny of Verona maketh mention in his 7 book and 60 chap. Val. Max. likewise in his 7 book and 1 chap. Pelleus in his 2 book: and the same Livy in the year 456.

Q. Fabius Gurgus Max. Decius Junius Brutus, son of Scævola.

The year following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gurgus and D. Junius Brutus Scævola as witness Livy and Cassiodorus. Zonaras nameth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cyprianus Kalender, Maximus and Scæva. The Sicilian registers, Brutus and Maximus. Livy, Pliny in his 7 book, the Capitol tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 5 times Col. before. And here an end of the Consuls for the first 10 books.

Since that after this Consulship, ten books of Livy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this story, so as now we are in manner destitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livy: from hence forward we will use principally in digetting and reckoning the years by the Consuls, the authority and testimony of Cassiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cyprianus book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help forever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this year therefore Cassiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Junius, were created Col. whole surnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcus, have not been left out (so much as in Cyprianus Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, saying thus, Lus. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was created Col. with C. Bubulcus, by that very court and assembly which himself called and held.

P. Cornelius Rufinus, M. Curius Dentatus.

The Col. this year are recorded by Cassiodorus, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus for whom in the Sicilian registers appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the sixth time. But of those forenamed Col. Cicero maketh mention in his book, entitled Cato: Patereculus in his first book, Valerius Max. in his first book and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Dentatus, as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap. for that he came into the world with teeth.

M. Valerius, Q. Cadius.

After M. Valerius and Q. Cadius were afterwards Col. as saith Cassiodorus. The old book of Cyprianus putteth to them the surnames of Corvinus and Noctua: which in the Sicilian registers are overspelled. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname also of the Valerii Corvini.

Q. Marcius, P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth for Consuls, Q. Marcius and P. Cornelius, Cyprianus book and the Greek records add their surnames, Tremulus II. and Arvinus II. who had been Consuls together once before.

467
M. Marcellus, Sp. Nautius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautius. The Greek records and Cyprianus book, have Marcellus and Rutilius.

468
M. Valerius, C. Aelius.

After M. Valerius and C. Aelius are ranged in this year for Col. by Cassiodorus. Cyprianus book putteth forth, Maximus and Pansa: but the Greek records, Potius and Pansa. Now you must think, that both Maximus and Pansa are the surnames of the Valerii.

C. Claudius, M. Aemilius.

For this years Col. Cassiodorus hath C. Claudius and M. Aemilius. The Greek records and Cyprianus book, Canina & Lepidus: whereof the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Aemilius.

C. Servilius, L. Caecilius.

By Cassiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Caecilius Merellus are placed Col. in this year: for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, instead of Lus. Caecilius, is written Calvus that is a falsity as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Consul, the Greek records add the surname of Turca, whom they put down Col. with Dento, they would lay Denter, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For Denter is a surname also given to the Caecili, as appeareth by Livy.

P. Cornelius Dolabella, Ca. Domitius.

Cassiodorus interreth P. Corn. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Col. Cyprianus Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus. And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which he seemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the war against the Gauls.

C. Fabricius, Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in for Col. C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: but the Sicilian registers, Luscius and Papus. Of them Cicero in his book Lectus, maketh mention in this manner: We see that Papus Aemilius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscius: for so we have heard our fathers say, that they were two Col. together, and companions in the censorship. Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabricius, and Q. Aemilius P. apus. This Aemilius, Plutarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

Here following col. as Cassiodorus sheweth, L. Aemilius & Q. Marcius: unto whom Cyprianus book and the Greek records give also to their surnames, Barbula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitol of their triumphs.

480

Serv. Cornelius. M'. Curvius.

P. Valerius. 474
T. Cornucaninus.

Pub. Valerius and Tit. Cornucaninus are by Cassiodorus placed in this year for Coss. The Greek records, Cuspinianus book, Florus, Orosius, and Entropius, give to Valerius the surname of Lentulus. And Plutarch hath assigner for Antistivus.

475
P. Sulpitius. P. Decius.

Next after those, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Sulpitius Consul with P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, have Savennius and Mus. Cicero in his 2 book, entituled De Fin, and in his Tusculan disputations, saith, That this Pub. Decius was the son of that P. Decius who vowed himself to death in the Samnites and Gauls war,

476
C. Fabricius. Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cuspinianus book and the Greek records, call Lustitius the second time, and Papus. That these were fellows together once before in the Consul, Cicero writeth in his book Latus. Plutarch in Pyrrhus. Gellius 3 book, chap. 8. Entropius, and Zonaras, make report of the same,

477
P. Cornelius. C. Junius.

Pub. Cornelius and C. Junius are rehearsed for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. Cuspinianus book hath Rufinus the second time, and Brutus. The Greek records. Rufinus and Bulsius. Zonaras hath Rufinus & Junius. Of P. Rufinus twice Coss. in his 2 book Of a perfect Orator Valer. Max. in his 3. book, and 4. chap. Gellius in his 4 book, and 8 chap. in his 17 book likewise and 21 chap. and last of all, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, make mention.

Q. Fabius. C. Gennius.

Cassiodorus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Gennius Consuls. The Sicilian registers have Gurgus and Cleptina. Of these Coss. Orosius maketh mention in this wise: When Fabius Gurgus was the second time Coss. with C. Gennius Cleptina, a grievous pestilence reigned both in the City, and also in the territory about it.

479
M'. Curvius. L. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus and Entropius deliver unto us for Coss. M'. Curvius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers, Dematius and Lentulus. This is the third Consul of M'. Curvius, which together with Lentulus Consulship, is drawn out of the Capitoll records of triumph this year.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Coss. Servius Cornelius and M'. Curvius Cuspinianus book and the Greek records, Merenda, & Dematius the third time. This M'. Curvius is now Coss. the fourth time, for, thrice he was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merenda, Pliny relateth and writeth, that he received a princely coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the Coss. of the former year, for winning a town of the Samnites.

C. Fabricius. C. Claudius.

Cassiodorus setteth down, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Consuls: the Sicilian records, Licinius and Caninus. Cuspinianus Kalender, Licinius and Caninus. Entropius, Fabius Licinius and C. Claudius Canina. Velleius, Fabius Dorso and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be understood, that these Consuls were called, C. Fabius Dorso Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorso was an old name of the Fabii.

L. Papirius Curvor. Sp. Carvilius.

Next after them, Cassiodorus nominateth for Coss. Sp. Carvilius and Lu. Papirius Curvor. The records both of Sicily and Cuspinian, have Curvor and Maximus. Both these were now Coss. the second time, as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus speaketh of them in his book Of water-conduits, and Livy in his 24 book.

C. Quintius. L. Gennius.

It is reported by Cassiodorus, that C. Quintius and L. Gennius were Consuls. Cuspinianus book and the Greek records, set to their surnames, Claudius and Cleptina. Livy in his 7 book speaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of one leg, from whom haply this surname is drawn.

C. Gennius. Cn. Cornelius.

Reported there are for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus, C. Gennius and Cn. Cornelius: whose surnames were Cleptina and Blasio, as it appeareth in Cuspinianus book. This Caius Gennius is the same, who before-time was Consul. As for C. Blasio, he is described by his Consulship standing upon record in the Capitoll. The Greek records over-pass them both.

485
P. Sempronius. or after Q. Ogulphius
App. Claudius. some, Fabius Pictor.

After Cornelius and Gennius Consuls, Cassiodorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, and App.

App. Claudius, and of purpose over-skippeth Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor. Zonaras, Q. Gellus and C. Fabius: Of them speaketh Entropius saying: When Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor were Consuls, the Picenians raised war; and by the Consuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquished. Pliny also in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth he) was Consul, silver was coined and stamped for money, five years before the (second) Punic war. These Consuls, Pelleius also reckoneth in his first book. But Sigisius and Onuphrius advertise us, that the book of Entropius is very faulty in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Quin. Gulo, is should be read Q. Ogulphius: for of this Gulo, there is in no place besides, any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogulphius, son of L. Nepheus of A. surnamed Gallus, who a little before was sent in embassy to Prothomus. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogulphius a commoner, with Fabius a Patrician. Altho Onuphrius testifieth, that in the most ancient hand-written books of Entropius, the name is found of Ogulphius. And, as both the Greek records, and also Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Entropius, agree to this his judgment: so Hubertus Goltzius likewise in his Catalogue of Consuls, embraceth the same: and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coin witness as much. But in the mean while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul. Cal. for Ogul. Galbus.

P. Sempronius. App. Claudius.

Seeing that we settle the Consulship of the former year, in Ogulphius and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authority of Entropius, the Greek records, Cuspinian, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others: we will let down for this years Consuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whom Velleius in his first book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appian the son of Cacili. The Greek records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus: and Cuspinianus book Rufus. Moreover, this also Goltzius giveth us to understand, that the surname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aspiration [Sopis]: which is no rare thing to be seen in such antiquities: for we read in others of them, Philippus, Tamphilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumphus, for Philippus, Tamphilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumphus, and such like.

M. Attilius. L. Julius Libo.

Entropius putteth down for Consuls, M. Attilius and L. Julius Libo. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Libo. Cassiodorus, M. Attilius and Lulius. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitol triumphs.

D. Iunius. 488
N. Fabius.

Cassiodorus reporteth for Coss. this year, D. Iunius and N. Fabius: the Sicilian registers, Pera and Pictor: the capitol records of triumphs, D. Iunius son of D. nephew of D. surnamed Pera, and N. Fabius son of C. nephew of M. surnamed Pictor. Upon what occasion these Fabii took the surname of Pictor, Pliny sheweth in his 35 book chap. 4. Vider. Max. in his 4 book and 3 chap. seemeth to note and signify, that Fabius Gurgus and N. Fab. Pictor, lived at one and the same time.

489
Q. Fabius M. Aemilius. L. Mamilius Vitulus.

This year also Cassiodorus passeth over. The Greek records shew, Maximus and Vitulus. Zonaras, Q. Fabius, and Aemilius (no doubt) for Mamilius, by some error and fault of the copies. Cuspinianus out of some old books delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and Lu. Mamilius. Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab. Maximus Gurgus was now thrice Consul.

490
Ap. Claudius. M. Fulvius.

Besides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls. Gellius also, who calleth them thus, App. Claudius brother of Cacili surnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. In like manner Livy, Paterculus, and Pliny in his book of famous men: as also Appianus, Livy, Frontinus in his 1 book of Stratagems, Entropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

M'. Valerius. M'. Otacilius.

Cassiodorus and Entropius shew unto us, that M'. Valerius and M'. Otacilius were Consuls. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Otacilius Crassus. Cuspinianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max. Messala and Crassus. Of these Consuls, Ver. Flaccus, Polybius, Cassiodorus, Entropius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report. As for Macrobius, he rendereth a reason, why M'. Valerius was in this government of his named Messala: and Pliny likewise, in his first book and five and thirtieth chapter.

L. Posthumius. Q. Mamilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for next Consuls, L. Posthumius and Q. Mamilius. Zonaras nameth them, Posthumius Albinus and Quintus Mamilius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Vitulus: but the capitol monuments, L. Posthumius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Megellus, and Q. Mamilius son of Q. nephew of M. surnamed Vitulus.

L. Valerius. 493 T. Otacilius.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consul: for this year L. Valerius and T. Otacilius: the surname of Valerius is Flaccus, and of Otacilius, Crassus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilian records.

Cn. Cornelius. 494 C. Duilius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras being in for Coss. Cn. Cornelius and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Solinus he hath added. The Sicilian Registers shew Scipio and Duilius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is surnamed also Asina, by the capital writers Orosius, Eutropius, and Valerius in his first book chap. 10. of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Asina (qd. he) was given to the Cornelius, for that the first of the House Cornelius having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the solemn manner) he was required to put in good sureties for security, brought into the open market place a she ass laden with money, and pawned down that presently in stead of pledges.

C. Aquilius son of M. L. Cornelius son of L.

There are nominated by Cassiodorus for Consuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Eutropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Aquilius Florus. Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Eutropius and Orosius.

A. Atilius Calatinus. 496 Q. S. Spilius.

Polybius avoucheth for this years Consuls, A. Atilius and C. S. Spilius. Cassiodorus, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Spilius. The Sicilian Registers and Cassianus Kalender. Calatinus and Paternus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. S. Spilius Paternus. Zonaras Atilius Calatinus and Caius Spilius. Of these Consuls, Polybius, Cicero, Valerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Pliny the younger, Cellus, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus make mention. But concerning the surname of Salpustius Paternus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another: to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other migrations: for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus. In the former Cassius, whereby Goltzius doth conjecture, that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular.

Cn. Cornelius. 497 C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius and L. Atilius Serranus, for Consuls; but Polybius, C. Atilius. The capitol tables, C. Atilius Regulus. Cassianus Kalender, and the Sicilian registers, have Atilius and Blaesius the second time. But how Atilius should come by his surname Serranus, Pliny sheweth in his 8th book, saying: In these dates the field was sowed by the very hands of L. Serranus themselves, and a man easily would believe thereby that the ground joyed an August plough share and a triumphant playman. Him they found a sowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blaesius, all authors well need besides, approve the judgment of Cassianus: but Goltzius supposeth, that he was not the same man that was Consul before; and therefore he writeth him the son of C. nephew of L., without putting to the numeral note II.

Q. Cadius. 498 L. Manlius.

The next Consuls that succeeded, were (by Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Cadius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them, Pulso and Cadius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius. Eutropius, M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Pulso: and Polybius, M. Atilius and L. Manlius. Inferius in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But we must understand, that Q. Cadius died whilst he was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted in his room, and made Consul the second time; as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, Lu. Manlius Pulso Longus: and in stead of Q. Cadius, M. Atilius Regulus the second time; as also by Cassianus book, wherein is written, Longus, and Regulus.

M. Aemilius Paulus. 499 Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss. this year, Ser. Fulvius and M. Aemilius, Cassianus Kalendar No. 10. and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Paternus and Paulus. Cassiodorus and Eutropius, together with the Capitoline records have Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Aemilius Paulus.

Cn. Cornelius. 500 A. Atilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this years Consuls Cn. Cornelius and A. Atilius. The capitol authors write, A. Atilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio the second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Scipio twice Consul, thus writeth Valerius in his first book: Cn. Cornelius S. Asina, who being Consul, was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the law law of arms lost whatsoever he had recovered, all again, and was made Consul the second time: so as, of a Consul he became a captive, and of a captive twice Consul.

Cn. Servilius. 501 C. Sempronius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Capius and Blaesius. Zonaras, Servilius Capius and C. Sempronius. Eutropius and Orosius, Cn. Servilius Capius and Sempronius Blaesius. Of the same Consuls, Sabinus in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitol.

C. Arelia Cotta. 502 P. Servilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in as Coss. C. Arelia Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian registers, Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitol, C. Arelia Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. Zonaras, Pub. Servilius and C. Arelia. Cicero in his book, entituled Lucilla writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilius Geminus, was twice Consul. Frontinus also in his fourth book of Stratagems, and likewise Orosius, make mention of C. Cotta Consul in Sicily.

L. Caecilius Metellus. 503 C. Furius.

Polybius setteth down for Consuls, L. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilius. Zonaras, Caecilius Metellus, and C. Furius. Cassiodorus, Lu. Caecilius and C. Furius. Eutropius, Orosius, and a capitol stone, L. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius Pacilius. This is that Lu. Metellus, twice Consul and high priest, of whom Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter.

C. Atilius Regulus. 504 L. Manlius.

Polybius placeth for this years Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Manlius. Cassiodorus, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Orosius and a capitol stone, have C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Pulso, both Coss. the second time. Zonaras, C. Atilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Pulso.

P. Claudius. 505 L. Junius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius infer for Consuls the next year, Pub. Claudius and L. Junius. Zonaras, L. Junius and C. Pulcher. Florus and Suetonius in Tiberius, put to Claudius the surname of Pulcher: and Confortinus to Junius of P. Ilius: which also are upon record in the Sicilian and capitoline tables. This P. Claudius, Cicero in his books of Divination and of the nature of gods) calleth the son of App. Cæcilius: but Pliny (in his seventh book, and three and fortieth chapter) nameth him his nephew or son. The capitol writers take part with Cicero. Pul. Maximus in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Consuls.

P. Servilius. 506 C. Arelia.

For Consuls this year, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Servilius and C. Arelia. Cicero in his book Lucillus, saith that these were twice Consuls. Which also is apparent by the Capitol and Sicilian tables: in which their surnames are to be seen, Geminus II, and Cotta II.

L. Caecilius. 507 N. Fabius.

IT is recorded by C. Cassiodorus, that the Consuls of this year, were L. Caecilius and N. Fabius: but Zonaras nameth them, Caecilius Metellus, and Numerius Fabius. Cassianus Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have them in this manner: Metellus II, and Buteo II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, L. Caecilius Metellus II, N. Fabius Buteo II. Pliny also reporteth in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Consul.

M. Fabius. 508 M. C. Servilius.

Cassiodorus setteth down as Consuls, M. Fabius and M. Otacilius. The Sicilian registers, Crassus and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth book and sixth chapter, hath F. Licinius and Otacilius Crassus. The capitol marble stones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M. Otacilius Crassus. Besides, Gellius in the place before alleged, Florus likewise in his 19th Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of these Consuls: as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

M. Fabius. 509 C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and C. Atilius, Consuls for this year. The Sicilian tables, Buteo and Bulb. But those of the capitol, M. Fabius Buteo, and C. Atilius Bulb. Of Fabius the Consuls shipwreck, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Livy.

A. Manlius. 510 C. Sempronius.

For this years Consuls, Cassiodorus setteth forth unto us, A. Manlius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian records, Torquatus and Blaesius. Cassianus book hath Atilius and Blaesius. The capitoline tables shew A. Manlius Torquatus Atilius, and C. Sempronius Blaesius II.

C. Fundanius. 511 C. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth down, C. Fundanius, and C. Sulpitius for Consuls. The Sicilian writers ters, Fundulus and Gallus. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanius Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. None besides make mention of them.

C. Licinius Caninius. A. Postumius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this year, C. Licinius and A. Postumius. The Sicilian records, Caninius and Albinus. Entropius, and the Capitol marbles, C. Licinius Caninius, and A. Postumius Albinus.

Q. Lutatius Cerco. A. Manlius.

Cassiodorus, Entropius, and Orosius. shew for consuls this year, Q. Lutatius, and A. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cerco and Torgatus. They of the Capitol, Q. Lutatius Cerco, and A. Manlius Torgatus Atricus II. Indeed C. Lutatius Cerco, is named for an Embassador by Livy in his 42 book.

514
C. Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

For this year there were Consuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tuditans, according to Cassiodorus and the Capitol writers. The Sicilian records testify also the same surnames. Of these consuls likewise, besides the Capitol Writers, Cicero speaketh in his Caio and Brutus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Atricus, wherto Varro also agreeth) the 514 year from the foundation of the city; as also in his first Tuclian question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chap. and Cassiodorus.

C. Mamilius. Q. Valerius.

Next there followed in consuls place, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, C. Mamilius and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turrinus and Felco: and after the Capitol records, C. Mamilius Turrinus, and Q. Valerius Felco. Besides, Verrinus Flaccus and Cassiodorus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Cons. in his 17 book and 21 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brutus and the Tuclian questions, in which year they say, that Ennius the Poet was born.

516
T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the year following, Cassiodorus hath consuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracchus and Falco, in Cuspinian Kalender and the Sicilian records. Zonaras avoucheth, Semp. Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The Capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Falco. Orosius speaketh of these consuls.

517
Next to them, Cassiodorus reporteth for consuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Ennius. Zo- narus, L. Ennius and Q. Plautius. Entropius, L. Cornelius Leptinus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Capitol registers give to Lentulus, the surname Candanus: and therefore in Cuspinian Kalender, they stand by the names of Candinus and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out clean.

C. Licinius. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonaras, Leptinus and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Lentulus Candinus. In like manner Confortinus; who reckoneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundation: following between the computation of Varro, Cicero, and Pliny Cuspinian Kalender and the Sicilian registers, name them Cladius and Varus.

519
T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Atilius.

This year had for consuls, as Cassiodorus saith, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian records, shew Torquatus and Bulbus: but Entropius, Orosius, and the Capitol Tables shew, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Atilius Bulbus: unto Bulbus The Capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Atilius Bulbus the second time were coſs, according to Verrinus Flaccus, Entropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was shut the second time, as Plutarch sheweth in Numerius; as Livy also, Velleius, Entropius, and Orosius, do testify.

Cassiodorus nameth for consuls this year, L. Postumius and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian Registers have Albinus and Ruga. Zonaras, Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius. The Capitol writers have L. Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius Maximus. That Ruga was a surname to Carvilius, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M. Pomponius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matbo. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Pomponius Matbo. Zonaras hath Q. Fabius Max, and M. Pomponius. The surname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himself the first of that name, whatsoever Polybius writeth in his third book.

Verrucosus he was called besides of a wart upon his lip, as Plutarch witnesseth, and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Arctus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Emilius. The Capitol tables shew M. Emilius Lepidus, and M. Poplicius.

C. Papirius. M. Pomponius.

Next after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Cassiodorus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second book. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Matbo. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Matbo. Of C. Papirius, son of C. surnamed Maso, a Pontiff or Bishop, Livy speaketh in the year 540.

524
M. Emilius. M. Junius.

Zonaras and Cassiodorus exhibit unto us for Consuls, M. Emilius and M. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Emilius Barbula and M. Junius Pera.

L. Postumius. Cn. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus setteth down L. Postumius and Cn. Fulvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinus and Centumalus. But those of the Capitol, and Entropius, present unto us L. Postumius Albinus and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. Polybius nameth Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius.

Q. Fabius II. Sp. Carvilius.

There are by Cassiodorus nominated for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers set also unto Carvilius Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his book entitled Cato, likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of these Consuls, and so doth Velleius in his chapter, discoursing of the kindness and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

527
P. Valerius. M. Atilius.

These are set down by Cassiodorus for Coſs. this year, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaccus and Regulus. The Capitol records represent P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus. Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

528
L. Apustius. M. Valerius.

Next after, Cassiodorus putteth L. Apustius and M. Valerius Consuls. The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apustius. The Capitol monuments L. Apustius Fido, and M. Valerius Messala.

C. Atilius. L. Aemilius.

Immediately followed Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Aemilius Pa-pis. The Sicilian registers. Regulus and Papys. Zonaras, Regulus and Aemilius. Of these Consuls also Orosius maketh mention: and Pliny in his third book and twentieth chapter, where truly men read Papulus for Papis.

530
T. Manlius. Q. Fulvius II.

The year following, had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Cassiodorus and Polybius. and as Orosius saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Cuspinian tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torgatus the second time, and Flaccus likewise the second time, shewing the surnames only of these Coſs.

531
G. Flaminius. P. Furius Philus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Coſs, C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Polybius. Zonaras nameth them Flaminius and Furius. Plutarch likewise in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the Capitol records, G. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

532
M. Marcellus. Cn. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Entropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitol tables M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Consul: and this is that Scipio, who afterwards with his brother Scipio was slain in Spain by Asdrubal the Carthaginian.

533
P. Cornelius. M. Minucius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for these years Consuls, C. Cornelius and M. Minucius. So doth Zonaras.

ras, The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Rufus. Entropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minutius Rufus. Cyprianus book A. f. and Rufus. Sigismus and Onophrius both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio A. f. was his son, who in the first Punick war was twice consul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius A. f. as an honorable Senator, and who had been consul.

534 C. Lutatius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for consuls, L. Veturius and C. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers Philo and C. Lutatius. Cassiodorus book Philo and Scavola.

535 L. Emilius.

The consuls next following were M. Livius and L. Emilius, as Cassiodorus witnesseth. Cyprianus book and the Greek records these Salinator and Paulus. Zonaras, M. Livius and Emilius Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of these consuls in the 29 book and first chapt.

536 P. Cornelius Scipio, T. Sempronius Longus.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for consuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonaras, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Eurypilus, Probus, Orofius, and Padianus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. Whiles these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

537 C. Servilius Geminus, C. Flaminius.

Then followed consuls, as Polybius, Cassiodorus, and Livy write, Cn. Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilius the surname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now second time consul, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracy in the Ides of March: not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicio or signs of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Amilcar coming into Italy, fought a battel at the lake Trasimene, where his army was wholly defeated and himself lost his life: into whose place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been consul before, was substituted. Thus much out of Livy and Polybius.

538 C. Terentius Varro, L. Emilius Paulus.

Next to them Polybius bringeth in L. Emilius and C. Terentius for consuls. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Varro. Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Emilius Paulus. Livy, Cassiodorus, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Emilius Paulus. Galvamus addeth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Aulus, a thing by others passed over.

539 L. Posthumus Albinus, M. Claudius Marcellus, II. Q. Fabius Maximus, III. T. Sempronius Gracchus, II.

Livy reporteth that the consuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumus Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been master of the horse men, and that Posthumus before that he entered into government, was by Hannibal in France, environed and slain, in whose stead M. Marcellus was substituted: consul now the second time, who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, resigned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and said, That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plutarch. And for this cause it is that Cassiodorus, Orofius, and Emilius do put down for this years consuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

540 Q. Fabius, IV. M. Claudius Marcellus, III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, set out for consuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and Frontinus in his second book of Strategems, make mention of these consuls.

541 Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus, T. Sempronius Gracchus, II.

Against this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucosus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time: as Livy testifieth and Cassiodorus, together with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had been Pretor the former year: and Gracchus consul two years before. These consuls Gellius nominateth out of Quadrigrarius, the second book and second chapter. Likewise Cicero and Valerius.

542 App. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, III.

The consuls created for this year by the Dictator, were Quintus Appianus Flaccus the third time, who then was master of the horse men, and Appianus Claudius Pulcher, who in his pretorship was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Cassiodorus, and Festus in his 17 book do witness.

C. Sulpicius Galba, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Upon the receipt of certain letters, the Consuls agreed together, that Claudius should hold the election for magistrats and see it finished, whiles Fulvius remained still before Capua. Claudius created for consuls, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpicius son of Servilius, and surnamed Galba, who before time had born no state-office of the chair. Thus writeth Livius. The same consuls also Cassiodorus doth deliver. Orofius likewise and Festus in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpicius, he is named in his second consularship, as it appeareth upon record in the capitol, the son of Servilius, nephew of Publius surnamed Galba Maximus.

M. Val. Livinius, II. M. Claudius Marcellus, IV.

Livy, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Entropius, and Orofius, do present for consuls this year, M. Val. Livinius and M. Valerius Livinius. Now this is Marcellus his fourth consularship, as Plutarch and Livy write: but Cassiodorus saith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Livinius leaving out that consularship which he bare not through because of the error in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writeth that M. Val. Livius was twice consul. In like manner, the book of Cyprianus hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Livinius the second time. And therefore Onuphrius supposeth that his first consular was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and his second, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fabius Maximus, V. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, IV.

The consuls for this year created, were Q. Fabius the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the same man who being Dictator, held the assembly for that election: as Livy and Cassiodorus do witness. The Sicilian records set forth Fabius and Flaccus. Whiles these were consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Rullus, saith that Capua was won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before. Of these consuls Valerius also, together with Plutarch, Entropius, and Orofius have made mention.

546 M. Claudius Marcellus, V. T. Quintus Crispinus.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, there entered into their consularship, M. Marcellus the fifth time (so ye reckon that consularship which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintus Crispinus. So saith Livy. Plutarch also nameth Marcellus the fifth time and Crispinus. But Cassiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Crispinus, passing over that faulty consular of his. Moreover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Plinius the younger, Probus, Entropius, and Orofius: who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Annib. in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place, and Quintus fled sore wounded.

C. Claudius Nero, M. Livius Salinator.

When the LL. of the Senat cast about to see whom they should create consuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government M. Livius, who many years before, upon a consular that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned: and almost eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus and Marcus Livius then consuls, reduced into the city. In like manner, the Sicilian Registers name for consuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitol records shew C. Claudius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

Q. Caecilius Metellus, L. P. Veturius Philo.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the records of the capitol, exhibit unto us for consuls this year, L. P. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caecilius Metellus. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Philo. Over and besides, of these consuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius Plutarch in Africanus, Appianus in Ibericus, Pliny in his 7 book 43 chap, do make mention.

P. Cornelius Scipio, P. Licinius Crassus.

Lucius Veturius Philo held the assembly for creation of Magistrats, wherein all the centuries in general, with exceeding great favour nominated Publius Scipio for consul, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Crassus, the supreme pontiff. Thus saith Livy. The Sicilian tables have Scipio with Crassus. The capitol records shew P. Cornelius Scipio.

Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Crassus the rich, of whom Cassiodorus likewise and Cicero in Brutus do speak.

M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempr. Tudianus, L. Iov. Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do name for Consuls this year; P. Sempronius Tudianus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus, the Sicilian registers, Cethegus and Tudianus; of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Entropius, and Cassiodorus do often times make mention. In this year P. Scipio Nasica, judged by the Senate the best man in the city, received dame Idah.

Cn. Servilius Capio, C. Servilius.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments, put us to us for Consuls, Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capio had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max. and Annibal with a sad cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africa by commandment of certain delegate Embassadors, in the seventeenth year of the second Punick war.

552

Tib. Claudius Nero, M. Servilius Geminus.

M. Servilius Geminus, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Consuls this year according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius standeth surnamed Pulex, Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In these Consuls year, Annibal was in Africa by Scipio overthrown, and a second peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Entropius do report.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Aelius Paetus.

A gainst this year were created Consuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Paetus. So faith Cassiodorus also and Pliny in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken peece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lentulus and P. Aelius in the Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Paetus. These two were Pretors both in the year 550.

P. Sulpicius Galba, C. Aurelius Cotta.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus put down for Consuls, P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpicius in the year 542 was first Consul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. These same Consuls are to be seen in the capitol tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian,

L. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Villius Tappulus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Cornelius and P. Villius, as Cassiodorus writeth: but according to Livy and the capitol monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Of P. Villius Consul, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintus.

T. Quintius Flaminius, Sex. Aelius Paetus.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus, the capitol records, together with Plutarch in Quintus, report unto us for consuls this year, T. Quintius Flaminius and Sex. Aelius Paetus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminius and Paetus; Pliny in his book of famous men, faith (but not without some error) that this Flaminius was the son of that C. Flaminius who was slain at Thrasymene. Whereas in deed this man was descended of the noble Patrician house of the Quintii, the other of the family of Flaminiis, no better than commoners. Now this Sex. Aelius Paetus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the poet Ennius:

This Sexus Aelius in records, Catus surnamed ye set.
A worthy might for wisdom sake a discreet man was he.

And therefore in the capitol tables he is called Paetus Catus.

C. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Minutius Rufus.

In this year C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were consuls, after Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol marbles. Their surnames only appear in the Sicilian registers: And Cicero speaketh of them in Brutus.

558

L. Furius Purpureo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annals deliver unto us Porphyreus and Marcellus.

M. Porcius Cato, L. Valerius Flaccus.

M. Aulus Porcius Cato and L. Valerius are ranged Consuls this year, by Ferrus Flaccus, Cicero in many places, Livy, Plutarch, Pliny, Valerius, Probus, Entropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

560

P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, II.
T. Sempronius Longinus.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicily, match Consuls together this year, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the (second second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felony, appeareth in Padianus.

561

L. Cornelius Merula, Q. Minutius Thermus.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus, and the capitol authors, write that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this year, were L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records, Probus speaketh of them in Annibal, and Frontinus in his book of stratagems.

562

L. Quintius Flaminius, C. Domitius Ahenobarbus.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus were this years Consuls, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records testify. The Sicilian registers also shew their surnames.

M. Acilius Glabrio, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

The Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of C. as testify Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintus, and Appian in his Syriack history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the same authors report that the war against Antiochus King of Syria, and against the Atians, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Pauculus and Macrobium, is called the Asiatic war, but by Livy and Pliny the younger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 562 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobium writeth in his first book of Saturndals.

Cassiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Laelius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth book and fourth chapter nameth C. Laelius son of C. and L. Scipio, son of P. To Laelius Cassiodorus only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Africanus, was brother to Africanus.

565

C. Manlius Vulso, M. Fulvius Nobilior.

C. Natus Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Cassiodorus, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicily. Manlius was Pretor in the year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

566

C. Livius Salinator, M. Valerius Messala.

The Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livy and Cassiodorus testify, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Aemilius Lepidus, C. Flaminius.

The next Consuls, were M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius; as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, Zonaras, Serabo in his fifth book, the Sicilian and capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his sixth book. This is that M. Lepidus, who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consul, Censor, and President of the Senat fix times chosen by the Censors. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senat and disinherited.

568

Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Martius Philippus.

L. Iov. Cassiodorus, Entropius, and the capitol tables report Consuls for this year. Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely, Albinus and Philippus. Valerius maketh mention of them in his sixth book and third chapter. Likewise Pliny in his 33 book and tenth chapter.

569

Ap. Claudius Pulcher, M. Sempronius Tudianus.

For these years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tudianus, as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tudianus.

P. Claudius Pulcher, L. Porcius Cicerius.

The Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Porcius Cicerius & P. Claudius Pulcher: witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Licinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Labeo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

A gainst this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Fabius Labeo, according to Livy, Cassiodorus, & the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whilst these were consuls, Atticus wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annibal.

L. Aemilius Paulus, Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

C. Natus Babius Tamphilus and L. Aemilius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol, year and the Sicilian tables do testify, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Aemilius is the son of that L. Aemilius, who was slain at Cannae, as Plutarch and Velleius do witness.

P. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Babius Tampilus

Publius Cornelius Cethegus and M. Babius Tampilus, succeeded Consuls this year, after Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol tables. Cethegus and Tampilus they be called in the Sicilian records. Of P. Cornelius and M. Babius consuls Plutarch made mention in Numa. Of P. Cornelius and M. Babius Tampilus, Valerius speaketh in his first book and fifth chapter. Of P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Babius Tampilus in 11 book and fifth chapter. But Pliny in his 12 Book and 13 chapter calleth the one P. Cornelius Cethegus, son of Lucius; and the other M. Babius son of Q. (turned Tampilus).

A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Calpurnius Piso

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this year Consuls A. Posthumus Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso. The Sicilian tables, Albinus and Piso. Piso was Pretor in the year 567. And Albinus anno 568. But when as a pestilence had reigned now three years, so as it dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy, it hapned that C. Calpurnius died, not without suspicion that he was murdered by Q. Hostilius: in whole room Q. Fulvius Flaccus his father in law or mother's husband, was declared Consul.

L. Manlius Acidinus, Q. Fulvius Flaccus

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records shew for Consuls this year, L. Manlius Acidinus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Sicilian tables, Acidinus with Flaccus. Cicero maketh mention of Acidinus a Consul, in his second book of a perfect orator. Also observed it is in the capitol monuments, that these Consuls were german brethren: and the same hath Velleius in his second book reported. And thereby it cometh to pass, that in the capitol tables L. Manlius Acidinus, is surnamed also Fulvianus after the manner of those that are adopted.

M. Junius Brutus, A. Manlius Vulso

Next Consuls created, were M. Junius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulso: as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. Brutus and Vulso they be named in the Sicilian monuments. This Brutus was Pretor in the year 562, and Vulso in 571.

C. Claudius Pulcher, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus

C. Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, are matched Consuls this year by Vir. Placcus, Livy, and Cassiodorus. Of this Tib. Gracchus Cicero speaketh in his first book of divination, and Frontinus in his first of strangers,

C. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, Q. Petilius Spathinus

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records exhibit unto us for Consuls, C. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spathinus. The Sicilian Registers, Scipio and Petilius. But when as Scipio returning out of the mount Albanus, fell into a fit of Apoplexy, and so into a dead palsy, whereupon he went to the bath at Coma, whereby, by reason that his disease grew upon him he departed this life; Q. Petilius the other Consul, created for his companion to enter presently upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinius. Thus saith Livy.

P. Mutius Scaevola, M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

Q. Rosius putteth down for Consuls Lepidus and Mutius, Cassiodorus and Obsequens. M. Lepidus and P. Mutius. The Sicilian tables, Lepidus and Scaevola. The capitol monuments, P. Mutius Scaevola and M. Aemilius Lepidus II. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy. Cicero likewise writeth in his discourse of Provinces, Valerius also in his first book and six chapter, that this M. Aemilius Lepidus was twice Consul.

Sp. Posthumus Albinus, Q. Mutius Scaevola

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumus Albinus and Q. Mutius. The capitol records, Sp. Posthumus Albinus and Q. Mutius Scaevola. C. Spathinus book hath Paulus and Scaevola. Pliny maketh mention of these in his second book and 31 chapter. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy.

L. Posthumus Albinus, M. Popilius Lanatus

The Cons. for this year created, were L. Posthumus Albinus and M. Popilius Lanatus, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments do testify. Albinus and Lanatus are put down in the Sicilian records. Whiles these were consuls, the feast Floralia was instituted first, as Ovid sheweth in his first book of his Kalender,

C. Popilius Lanatus, P. Aelius Liguri

This year had for consuls, C. Popilius Lanatus, and P. Aelius Liguri, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. The Sicilian registers name them Lanatus and Aelius. To this day had no Cons. in one year been matched together both commoners: and this was the first time, that both consuls were created out of the commons, as is observed in the capitol monuments. After this, you shall never find the consuls both Patricii: commoners yet shall have them both twain, many a time and often: but most of all, a commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P. Licinius Crassus, C. Cassius Longinus

The Consuls next ensuing for this year, were P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, as it appeareth in Livy, Cassiodorus, Orosius, and the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longus. Of the very same Consuls Pliny maketh mention in his seventh book. Gellius also in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls the people of *Rome began war against Perseus King of the Macedonians, son of Philip: which T. Lornus and Entropius, together with Orosius, call the second Macedonian war: whereof Livy and Plutarch write more at large.*

A. Hostilius Mancinus, A. At. L. Serranus

Cassiodorus setteth next after for Consuls, C. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Mancinus, and Au. Atilius Serranus. As well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annals of Livy.

Q. Marcius Philippus, II. Cn. Servilius Capio

Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol tables match together in the Consulship of this year Q. Marcius Philippus the second time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philp and Capio. Cicero in his books entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Consulship.

L. Aemilius Paulus, II. C. Licinius Crassus

The Consuls that next succeeded were L. Aemilius Paulus the second time (seventeen years after his first Consulship) and Cn. Licinius Crassus: witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian registers. Paulus and Crassus. As touching this second Consulship of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Velleius, Orosius, Entropius, Florus, and Jesimus in his 33 book do write. Plutarch addeth thus much and saith, That Paulus was threecore years of age, when he was chosen Consul the second time.

Q. Aelius Paetus, M. Junius

Livy bringeth in for Consuls next after, Q. Aemilius and M. Junius. The Sicilian records Paetus and Pennus. Obsequens and Cassiodorus Q. Aelius Paetus, and M. Junius Pennus. Cicero likewise in Brutus speaketh of Mar. Junius Pennus Consul with Q. Aelius. Now from this year forward, we want the compleat story penned by Livy.

M. Marcellus, C. Scipinius

Livy and the capitol monuments shew for this years Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Scipinius. Gallus Obsequens, and the title prefixed before the comedy Andria in Terence, exhibit Mar. Marcellus and C. Scipinius. This is that Marcellus, who after he had been thrice Consul, perished in the sea. Nephew he was of that M. Marcellus, who had been five times Consul, as Pedanius reporteth. Of these Consuls, Jesimus, Pliny in his second book, and many other have made mention.

Cn. Octavius, T. Manlius

Cassiodorus and Obsequens infer Consuls this year, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Octavius and Torquatus. The capitol stones, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of these consuls in the title before Hegeia in Terence. Cicero in his first book of Final ends, and likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Torquatus, Consul with Cn. Octavius.

A. Manlius, Q. C. C. C.

Cassiodorus matcheth together consuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q. C. C. C. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitol records A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. C. C. C. Longinus, who died in his consulship. These also had been companions together in their Pretorship, anno 586, as Livy bareth witness.

T. Sempronius, M. Lucius

Cassiodorus saith, that the consuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Lucius. Obsequens nameth them, T. Gracchus, and M. Lucius. The capitol monuments shew T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time and M. Lucius Tiberius. In the Sicilian registers, Dolabella and Thalva. But not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tib. Gracchus twice consul. And that M. Lucius died whiles he was consul, Pliny in his seventh book, and Valerius also do report.

P. Cornilius Scipio Nasica, C. Marius

Cicero in his first and second book of the nature of Gods, Scipio Nasica, Obsequens and Cassiodorus, report for consuls P. Cornilius Scipio Nasica and C. Marius. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they religned up their place, as the fore said authors witness together with Valerius, Plutarch and Pliny. P. Cornilius Nasica, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, entered in their stead.

593 M. Messala, C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Messala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian Catalogue Messala and Strabo. The Capitol records, and the title before Phormio in Terence represent unto us, M. Valerius Messala, and Caius Fannius Strabo. Of these Consuls Suetonius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewise in Cicero in Brutus, Pliny in his ninth book and fiftieth chapter, and Gellius in his second book.

594 L. Anicius, M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Cassiodorus and the title set before the Comedy Adelphi in Terence avouch for Coss. L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and Capitol records put surnames unto them, Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Consul, Cicero speaketh in Brutus; and of Cethegus, the six and fortieth Epitome or Breviary of Florus. In their year, it is for certain held, that L. Paulus who conquered Perseus, died.

595 Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, M. Fulvius.

The year next following had Consuls, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers shew Dolabella and Fulvius. The Capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The same is to be seen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

596 N. Aemilius, C. Popilius.

The Consuls next succeeding, were Marcus Aemilius and C. Popilius, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Lanas. The Capitol records have M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lanas the second time. Of the same, Censorinus maketh mention in his chapter of diffinition of ages.

597 Sex. Julius, L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus reporteth, that the next Consuls were Sex. Julius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and Capitol tables yield surnames unto them, Casus to Julius, and Orestes to Aurelius. Pliny writeth of them in his 33 book.

598 L. Lentulus, C. Martius.

Obesquens and Cassiodorus record for this years Consuls L. Lentulus and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lentulus and Figulus. The Capitol monuments, L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, and C. Martius Figulus the second time.

Cicero in Brutus speaketh of them both. And as touching Figulus twice Consul, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

599 P. Scipio Nasica, M. Claudius.

Publius Scipio and M. Claudius are by Cassiodorus set down for Coss. The Sicilian registers have Nasica and Marcellus. The Capitol records, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica the second time, and M. Claudius M. Acellus likewise the second time. Padianus writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Consul. And that Pub. Scipio Nasica, surnamed also Corculum, was twice Consul and Cenfor besides, Cicero writeth in his Brutus.

600 L. Posthumus, Q. Opimius.

This year had Consuls, L. Posthumus and Q. Opimius as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witness. The Sicilian tables shew Opimius and Albinus. But the Capitol records Q. Opimius, and L. Posthumus Albinus. Mention there is made of this Q. Opimius, Consul, by Cicero in his Brutus; also in the Epitome of the seven and fortieth book. Moreover, that Posthumus died in his magistracy, besides Verrius Flaccus, Obsequens also sheweth: in whose stead Mar. Acellus Glabrio was chosen.

601 Q. Fulvius, T. Annius.

The Consuls next following, as Cassiodorus writeth, were Q. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the Capitol fragments they are named Nobilior and Lusens. Cicero in his Brutus saith, that Q. Nobilior son of Marcus, and T. Annius Lusens were Consuls. The Greek records and Culpiantius book shew Nobilior and Lusens.

602 M. Marcellus, L. Valerius.

This year had for Consuls, M. Marcellus and L. Valerius as Cassiodorus witnesseth. The Sicilian catalogue representeth Marcellus and Flaccus. Obsequens exhibiteth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Consul, as Padian saith upon the Oration for Scavrus; and Cicero in his book of divination and destiny.

603 L. Licinius Lucullus, A. Postumius Albinus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Lucullus and A. Postumius. The Sicilian tables, Lucullus and Albinus. The broken marbles of the Capitol, Lucullus and Alb. Postumius son of Antus, Orestes and the Epitome 48, shew L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Post. Albinus. Cicero in his Brutus, and Lucullus both, maketh mention of the same.

604 T. Quintius, M. Acellus.

This year had for Consuls, T. Quintius and M. Acellus, as Cassiodorus witnesseth upon Pliny in his 7 book & 36 chap. calleth C. Quintius and M. Acellus. Cicero in his book Cato, and the 12. book of his Epistles to Atticus nameth T. Flaminius and M. Acellus, and saith that they were created Consuls in the 19 year after the death of Ennius. The Sicilian tables have Flaminius and Albinus. The Capitol fragments, Flaminius and M. Acellus Balbus.

605 L. Martius, M. Manilius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth for the Consuls of this year, L. Martius and M. Manilius: likewise the 49. Epitome. Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Censorinus and M. Manilius: book of Censorinus and Manilius in his twelfth book of epistles to Atticus. The same Consuls, Appianus in Libys nameth L. Martius Censorinus and M. Manilius. In like sort Censorinus in his treatise of Nativity or Birth-day. The Sicilian tables have Censorinus and Manilius. The Capitol fragments shew Censorinus and M. Manilius, son of Publius, nephew of Pub. While there were Consuls, there arose a third war between the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, besides Verrius Flaccus do testify: likewise Salmus, but that he saith with Verrius Flaccus, that it was the year 64, Cicero also in his eleventh Philippick, and lastly Entropius, with Orestes.

606 Sp. Posthumus, L. Piso.

Then were Consuls created, Sp. Posthumus and L. Piso, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In the Capitol fragments they are named A. Magnus, and L. Calpurnius, son of Caius, nephew of Caius, surnamed Piso Casinius. In Culpiantius Kalender, Magnus and Casinius, in the Sicilian catalogue Albinus and Piso. As for Magnus and Albinus, they be the surnames of Postumius: like as Casinius and Piso, of Calpurnius. In this year the people of Rome entered into arms against Andrisens, otherwise termed Pseudo-Philippus, which they call the third Macedonian war, after Florus and Entropius.

607 P. Africanus, C. Livius.

Obesquens and Cassiodorus set forth for consuls this year P. Africanus and C. Livius. In the Sicilian catalogue they are registred Scipio and Drusus: in the Capitol fragments Africanus Aemilianus, and C. Livius: the one son of M. Aemilianus, nephew of Marcus, the other surnamed Drusus. This Pub. Cornilius was the natural son of that Pamilius that vanquished Perseus King of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornilius the son of Scipio Africanus. Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornilius, son of Publius, nephew of P. Scipio Africanus the younger, and Aemilianus, as Valerius and others do witness. His two last surnames are in the Capitol records, out of which, the complete name of M. Livius Drusus, with his addition, was framed. Of these Consuls Cicero speaketh after: likewise Valerius, Anturventis, Appian, Plutarchus, Florus, both Rhinius, Entropius and Orestes.

608 C. Cornelius, L. Munimius.

Next consuls following, were Cn. Cornilius and L. Munimius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus: and according to Orestes, Valerius, Censorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth book of epistles to Atticus. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Munimius they are named. In the Sicilian registers Lentulus and Munimius. In the fragments of the Capitol, Lentulus and Munimius, nephew of Lentulus. L. Munimius in this magistracy acquired the surname of Achonus, upon a victory achieved by him in Achaia, as Plutarch in Marius, and Valerius do testify.

609 Q. Fabius Maximus, L. Hostilius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth unto us for Consuls Q. Fabius Maximus, together with L. Hostilius. Cicero in Lectus, and Pliny in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, nameth them Q. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancinus. Othius Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus, Valerius writeth in his second book and first chapter. This Q. Fabius was the son of P. Aemilius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrius, as Appianus writeth in Hispanicus: and therefore in the fragment of a Capitol table there is to be seen the second surname Aemilianus. Pliny was deceived, who in his 31 book 11 chapter calleth him Q. Allobrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the son of this Fabius.

610 Ser. Galba, L. Aurelius.

This year had for Consuls, Ser. Galba and L. Aurelius, according to Cassiodorus: those, Valerius in his six book nameth S. Supplicius Galba, and L. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the Capitol fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Snip. Galba, who being Pretor, as Suetonius writeth, stirred up the war before against Varrus, for he was a vehement Orator, of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Q. Metellus Macedonius defended. Cicero in Brutus, for Marcus and against Verres, maketh mention of him. Likewise Frontinus of them both, in his first book of water-conduits.

Cn. Claudius, Q. Metellus

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls App. Claudius and Q. Metellus. Origins, App. Claudius and Q. Metellus. The Sicilian registers have Claudius and Metellus. The capitol fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Caecilius Macedonicus. Of the same, Frontinus speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Achaeans, whereupon he was (named Macedonicus: whom Plinius 7 book sheweth to be the son of L. and nephew of Quintus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus. Orosius, L. Caecilius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilius. In like manner the capitol fragments Calvus and Servilius. This Servilius is the brother german of Q. Servilius Capius, the Consul two years after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted son of Q. Fabius Emilianus for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max. the son of Verrucius, the one out of the house Emilia, the other of Servilia. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonicus, as writeth Valerius in his treatise of Witnesses.

Cn. Capius, Q. Pompeius

Cicero Capius and Q. Pompeius are recounted Consuls by Cassiodorus. Velleius in his second book saith thus: Whether there were two or three houles of the Pompeii, the first of that name was Consul with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obicure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnesses nameth Aulus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in stead of A. F., the son of Aulus. In the same sort Appian in Hispanensis nameth him Qu. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius. Cicero in his Orations against Verrus, and in that for Ponticus, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Q. Capius, C. Lelius

After this were Consuls made, Qu. Capius and C. Lelius, my authors are Cassiodorus and Obsequens together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits. This Lelius as Cicero in his eleventh Philippic, and Velleius do report, was the son of Lelius the Consul, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his second book of Duties and in Lelius, was the first that was named Wife, whereof Plutarch in Gracchi yeeldeth a reason,

Cn. Piso

615 M. Popilius

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, Cn. Piso with M. Popilius. Appian and the Epitome have M. Popilius Darius: but they be named M. Popilius Lelius and L. Calpurnius by Velleius in his fifth book, "writeth thus: That Consul Hispanus, Lord chief justice for strangers; when M. Popilius Lelius and L. Calpurnius were Consuls; by an edict commanded all the Chaldeans [Astrologers] to depart out of Rome and Italy within ten dates next ensuing.

P. Scipio, D. Brutus

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Consuls by Cassiodorus, Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nasica (named Serapius in mockery by C. Curius a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Cass. Obsequens and Frontinus saith, that Nasica who was named Cornelius, and twice was he Consul and Censor also, nephew to that Nasica who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Angustulus, as Velleius saith: This Decius Brutus Cassiodorus with Brutus calleth the son of Marcius, who bare the Consulship in the year five hundred ninety seven, and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft. Valerius also in his 3 book, chap. 7, 3 book, chap. 3, 9 book, chap. 15: Likewise, Pliny in his 21 book, and lastly, Frontinus.

M. Emilius, C. Hostilius Mancinus

Cassiodorus and Obsequens match together in the consulship this year, M. Emilius, and C. Hostilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registers Leptidus and Mancinus. Orosius and Appian, M. Emilius Lepidus and C. Hostilius Mancinus. Of this Consul Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol. Cicero maketh mention oftentimes of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

P. Furius, Sex. Attilius Serranus

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, P. Furius and Sex. Attilius Serranus. Cicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Attilius. Obsequens, L. Furius and Attilius Serranus. The Sicilian registers Philus and Serranus. Of this Furius, Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus: L. Furius Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learnedly than others. In the capitol fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serranus the Consul.

Sext. Furius, C. Calpurnius

The next consuls are set down by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, Sext. Furius and C. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Piso, Orosius nameth S. Fulvius Flaccus and Q. Calpurnius Piso. The capitol fragments shew Piso: as for Fulvius Flaccus the Consul, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian also in his Ilyrica speaks of him, and in Hispanensis of Calp. Piso.

620

P. Africanus, C. Fulvius Flaccus

The year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Consuls, as it is written in Cassiodorus and Obsequens. But Sextus and Flaccus in the Sicilian catalogue. The same Flaccus the capitol fragments do shew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitome; and of Africanus twice consul by Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight book.

P. Mucius

621 L. Calpurnius

This year had consuls, P. Mucius, and L. Calpurnius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scævola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scævola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Pedanius upon the Orations against Verrus, maketh mention in these words: Scævola a right learned man in the Laws, was consul with L. Piso, that year wherein Tib. Oracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Piso, named also Frugi, and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verrus and in another for Ponticus writeth, that he was the first of the Piones, called Frugi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magistrates, when Martius and Manlius were consuls: he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

P. Popilius, P. Rupilius

Against this year were consuls created, as Cassiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Rupilius: after the Sicilian records Lacus and Rupilius, Cicero maketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epistles to Atticus, and against Verrus. Also in the capitol fragments we read of P. Popilius, son of Cains, and P. Rupilius son of P. and nephew of Publius Velleius in his second book, nameth the consuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lelius speaketh of Rupilius and Lacus. And of P. Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Breviary 59.

623

P. Crassus, L. Velleius

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, P. Crassus and L. Velleius. Cicero and Flaccus the Sicilian catalogue, L. Velleius, Flaccus and P. Crassus. Obsequens, Crassus and P. Crassus. Cicero in his eleventh Philippic against Antony. Of this consul P. Crassus all they have spoken, who wrote of the war of Antony. This P. Crassus I named Dives, by Cicero in his book of a per. Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scævola: whereupon Velleius in his second book nameth him Antony, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the house of Marcius into the family of the Crassi. This man Gellius writeth in his 8th book and 23 chap. to have been at all other, the richest man, the noblest person, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepest lawyer, and the first stream Bishop of Italy.

C. Claudius, M. Perperna

Appius Claudius and M. Perperna are matched in the Consul together this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Calpurnius book, and the Greek records, shew Leptinus and Pompeius. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table oftentimes commonly known, wherein is to be seen this inscription, C. Claudius and M. Perperna Consul. Which evidence Sigonius and Omphacius following, named him C. Claudius and not Appius. Of this M. Perperna as many as wrote the war of Antony, have made mention, and namely, Velleius in his 3 book and 4 chap. Velleius, Suetonius, Orosius, and Exuperius.

C. Sempronius, M. Aquilius

This year had consuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Traditarius according to the Sicilian registers, C. Sempronius Traditarius, and M. Aquilius, after Orosius. Cicero speaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods: and to his brother Quintus, Paterculus also in his second book. Strabo in his 14 book, Appian in his fifth book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

Cn. Octavius, T. Annius

Next followed as consuls Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, as Cassiodorus testifieth and none but he. For Calpurnius book and the Sicilian catalogue have Octavius and Rufus. Plutarch also writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a sedition. As for this C. Octavius vims, son he was to that Cneus who was Consul in the year five hundred eighty nine.

L. Cassius, 627 L. Cinna.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls, L. Cassius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cassiodorus books set out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Cassius was his son who bare the consulship in the year 590, and he was afterwards Censor in the year 629 furnished Ravilla by Frontinus.

M. Emilius, 618 L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens reckon for Coss. this year, Mar. Emilius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Orestes. Censorius hath M. Emilius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Orestes. Cicero in Brutus, Mar. Lepidus, and L. Orestes.

M. Plautius, 629 M. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens avouch Consuls this year, M. Plautius and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers, Hyppens and Flaccus. Orosius and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits, M. Plautius Hyppens and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Cassius Longinus, 630 C. Sextius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens report, that the consuls following were C. Cassius Longinus, and C. Sextius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Calvinus. Velleius writeth, that the colony Fabrateria was planted by Cassius and Calvinus. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of C. Sextius Calvinus. Entropius declareth for consuls, C. Cassius Longinus, and S. Domitius Calvinus, not without suspicion of a fault or error.

Q. Caecilius, 631 T. Quimius.

Cassiodorus nominateth for consuls this year, Q. Caecilius and T. Quimius. The Sicilian records Metellus and Flaminius. Entropius and Orosius. Q. Caecilius Metellus and T. Quimius Flaminius. Cicero in his Oration pleading for his house, calleth them T. Flaminius and Q. Metellus. This Q. Metellus was the eldest of the four sons of Macedonius, whom Plutarch in his treatise of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Metellus Balearicus, of the Balears whom in this magistracy he conquered.

Cn. Domitius, 632 C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens join in fellowship of the consulate this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Pliny in his second book and 32 chapter. Three moons (qd. i.e.) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Coss, which most men called the night-stars.

L. Opimius, 633 Q. Maximus.

This year had for consuls, Lu. Opimius and Q. Maximus, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Obsequens, L. Opimius and Q. Fabius Maximus. Pliny speaketh of them in his second book, laying, About the sun there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were consuls. This Q. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 book, and Pedanius upon the Orations against Verres, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and son of F. Emilius. And so may Syrabo, Appian, and Pliny be well reprov'd, for making him and his father Emilianus, all one. The same man, as Cicero and Pliny testify, was surnamed Allobrogicus, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Opimius consul, after whose name there was a wine called Opimianum. Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chap. Plutarch also in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his second book.

P. Manlius, 634 C. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus inferreth for this years consuls, P. Manlius and C. Papyrius. The Sicilian records Manlius and Carbo. This is that Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Perpenna were Coss, was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to divide lands: who first took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely, in his second book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

L. Caecilius, 635 L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens put down for consuls, Lu. Caecilius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plutarch in Marius speaketh of C. Metellus and Cotta consuls. Which Marius he writeth to have born the Tribuneship of the commons, when there were consuls, and to have cast Metellus the consul into prison. This is that Cotta, in whose consular room Velleius reporteth, that C. Caesar Flamin of Jupiter, was created.

M. Cato, 636 Q. Martius.

This year had for consuls Mar. Cato and Q. Martius: witnesseth Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Cato and Martius, according to the Sicilian registers. But Entropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martius. Valerius speaketh of of them in his fifth book, and Pliny in his second book 31 chap. Gellius also in his 13 book and 19 chap.

L. Lucilius, 637 Q. Mutius.

Consuls next ensuing by Cassiodorus his saying, were L. Lucilius and Q. Mutius. After the Sicilian registers, Metellus and Scævola, it ye go by Entropius, L. Lucilius Metellus and Q. Mutius Scævola. Now is this that L. Lucilius Plutarch in Coriolanus and in his book of the Roman fortune, nameth Diadematus, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a frontlet or wreath which they cal a diadem, to hide an ulcer that he had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or garter, it makes no matter, qd. Favonius, in what part of the body a man weareth the diadem: upbraiding and reproaching him for his Kinglike power, in terming a small clout or peece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Mutius Scævola the Augur, of whom Cicero in his book Lulus, and in the first book of an Orator maketh mention.

C. Licinius Geta, 638 Q. Maximus.

Cassiodorus completh together in society of Consulship this year, C. Licinius and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian registers name them Geta and Eburinus. Of this Q. Maximus Cicero speaketh in his Oration for Murena. That this man was of the house of the Fabii, his surname Eburinus sheweth, of whom writeth L. Iustus in this manner: Q. Fabius was called Pullus, Jovis, surnamed Eburinus, of whiteness, for that his buttock was blighted with lightning. Q. Iustus in his third Declaration reporteth that this Fab. Eburinus had a son unchaft of his body, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon put him to death. The same man Velleius calleth Q. Fabius Servilianus. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obscure and unknown heretofore, Goltzius out of an old antiquity of coin hath restored it, wherein, as he saith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Geta, son of Publius.

M. Metellus, 639 M. Scævus.

The consuls next following by Cassiodorus his report, were M. Metellus and M. Scævus. As for Metellus, the third son he was of Macedonius. But as touching M. Scævus, whom the writer of the book entituled of famous persons, calleth M. Scævus, Scævus, thus writeth Pedanius, M. Scævus (qd. he) was a Patritian indeed and of noble blood, but so, as the gentry of this house, for those descents before him lay obscure, neither father, nor grandire, by reason of their poor estate, and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignity in weal publick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Murena and in Brutus. Velleius also in his 5 book and 8 chap. and Pliny likewise in his 2 book and 36 chap.

M. Atilius Balbus, 640 C. Cato.

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, M. Atilius Balbus, and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato. Obsequens M. Atilius and C. Portius. Of the same consuls Pliny speaketh in the 2 book, chap. 29, and 58. Plutarch in Marius giveth to Atilius the surname Mannus. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Consul, nephew to M. Cato Censorinus, and Africanus sitters son, as saith Velleius, Cicero against Verres, and in Brutus.

C. Caecilius, 641 Cn. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens set down for next Consuls, C. Caecilius and Cn. Papyrius. The Sicilian registers Metellus and Cn. Carbo. Entropius, C. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. The same man Tacitus in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Consulship, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which year, both he and Obsequens do report, that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimbrians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth son of C. Metellus the son of Macedonius: whom, when he died, he left a son of Pretors calling, and in suit and election way to be Consul. This man gat a surname by force of reproach, as Cicero testifieth in his second book of a perfect Orator. Now surnamed was he Capitarius, as Plutarch saith in the Life of the Romans.

M. Livius Drusus, 642 L. Piso.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this years Consuls, M. Livius Drusus and L. Piso. The Sicilian catalogue Drusus and Piso. L. Piso surnamed Cassinus a man of Consular degree, was slain after by the Tigurins, when Lu. Cassius was Consul, as Orosius testifieth.

P. Scipio, 643 L. Calpurnius Bestia.

Cassiodorus nameth this year for Consuls, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius Bestia. The Sicilian records Nasica and Bestia. Obsequens, Pub. Scipio and L. Calpurnius. S. J. B. Entropius, and Orosius. P. Scipio Nasica and L. Calpurnius Bestia. Of these Consuls, P. Nasica Scipio and L. Bestia, Valerius likewise maketh report, lib. 1. chap. 6. Moreover, Cicero in his Brutus writeth that P. Scipio the son of P. Scipio surnamed Serapion and fellow Consul to L. Bestia, died in his Consulship. Of this P. Scipio there is some mention to be seen in a Capitol fragment.

Sp. Posthumius, M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and M. Minutius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Rufus, Salust, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minutius Rufus. Of M. Minutius, Velletius and the threecore and seventh Epitome make mention.

645
Q. Metellus, M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus saith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Metellus and Silanus, Padianus and Eutropius, Q. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velletius.

Ser. Galba, M. Scaurus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servius Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Salustius and Scaurus, Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, saith that S. Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the sixt time Consul. Of M. Scaurus the Consul, Velletius and Tacitus make mention. This is that M. Aurelius Scaurus, who being afterwards in embassage was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threecore and seventh Epitome.

647

Cassiodorus joineith in the consulship this year, L. Cassius and C. Marius. Cuspinianus book and the Sicilian records, Longinus and Marius, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marius and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Adileship, was created consul.

648
Q. Servilius Capio, C. Atilius.

Obsequens and Cassiodorus match consuls together this year, Q. Servilius Capio and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Capio and Serranus. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tullius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fifteenth book and eight and twentieth chap. hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

649
P. Rutilius Rufus, C. Manilius.

Put down by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this years consuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the son of Marcus. About the other consul the Annals do vary and disagree: some forename him C. others Cæus. Some name him M. Manilius, others Mallius or Manilius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in stone at Puteoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and Cn. Mallius were Consuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius, mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancius and Muræna: likewise in Valerius, Salust, Tacitus, Florus, Eutropius and Orosius. That he was not only a bafe man and of low birth, but also without all vertue and wit, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancius. Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Mallius were a kindred different from the Manlii, For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

C. Marius II, C. Flavius Fimbria.

The next Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus, C. Marius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbria: by Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria: Item, C. Marius and Caius Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velletius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speak often of these Cons.

651
C. Marius III, L. Aurelius Orestes.

Cassiodorus reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue Marius and Orestes. Moreover, Marius even in his absence was elected Consul the third time, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Velletius, Eutropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify.

652
C. Marius IV, Q. Lutatius.

Next after them are put down for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Marius and Catulus. Plutarch and Eutropius, Caius Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius Catulus. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

C. Marius V, M. Aquilius.

Then succeeded in the Consulship by the testimony of Cassiodorus, C. Marius the fifth time, and M. Aquilius. Of this C. Marius five times now Consul, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Cicero in his second book of a perfect Orator, nameth M. Aquilius for the companion of C. Marius in his fifth consulship. Of whom Plutarch in Marius speaketh and calleth him patre et avunculo, as also Appian in Mithridatica. Now this Marius Aquilius a Consular man, is the same who afterwards being an Ambassador, was by King Mithridates taken prisoner, and most villanously tormented and mangled.

C. Marius VI, L. Valerius Flaccus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this years consuls, C. Marius the sixt time, and L. Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus (afterwards Censor) was President of the Senat, and master of the horsemen under Sylla Dictator. Of these consuls Cicero speaketh very often, and namely, in his Brutus, in his oration for Rabirius, against Catiline and Antonia: and also in the defence of Plancius. Pliny likewise in his second book, Velletius, and Padianus upon the oration against Piso. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors besides. In this year (upon the twelfth day of July, then called Quintilis, as Macrobinus witnesseth) was C. Caesar born, who afterwards was surnamed Dictator.

M. Antonius, A. Postumius.

Reported it is by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, that M. Antonius and A. Postumius were Consuls this year. The Sicilian registers, shew Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment also of the capitol marbles, mention there is of An. Postumius. Cuspinianus book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of these Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewise, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap. where he noteth this the 655 year. Also Gellius in his 4 book and 6 chap.

Q. Metellus, T. Didius.

Quintus Metellus and T. Didius succeeded Consuls next in this year, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do write. And Padianus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Curio (saith he) accused Q. Metellus Nepos, son of Balearicus, and nephew of Macedonius, who was Consul with T. Didius. Cicero speaketh of the same man in his oration after his return.

657
Cn. Lentulus, P. Crassus.

Not only Cassiodorus, but the Sicilian registers also, do testify, that Cn. Lentulus and P. Crassus were Consuls this year: and Obsequens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and P. Licinius. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chap. also in his 33 book and second chap.

658
Cn. Domitius, C. Cossus.

This year had for Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Cossus, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witness. Cuspinianus annals and the Greek registers, shew Enobarbus and Longinus. A fragment of Per. Flaccus his marbles, Enobarbus and C. Cossus son of Lucius, Padianus speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

Lucius Crassus and Q. Scævola were consuls next following, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Consuls, is to be seen Crassus and Martius. In Censorinus, we find Lu. Licinius son of Lucius, Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that Crassus the orator bare all dignities of magistracy, together with Scævola the high-priest, except the Tribunal of commons and the Censorship: also that whiles they two were Consuls, Q. Hortensius pleaded the first cause that ever he undertook, at the bar. Padianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinius Crassus the Orator, and Q. Martius Scævola the arch-bishop, an orator besides and a professed lawyer, both Consuls together.

C. Calpurnius, L. Domitius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens declare for this years Consuls, C. Calpurnius and L. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calpurnius and Enobarbus. In a capitol fragment, they are Calpurnius and Lu. Domitius son of Cn. As for Calpurnius, it is the surname of Calpurnius. For Velletius maketh mention of one C. Calpurnius under Augustus. In like manner Cicero in his book entuled, The suing for a Consulship, and in his oration for Marcellus. Also Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius. Again, Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennius.

C. Valerius Flaccus, M. Herennius.

There are matched by Cassiodorus and Obsequens for consuls this year, C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken stone of the capitol, hath Flaccus and M. Herennius, Pliny in his 29 book and 3 chap. Cicero also in his Oration for Marcellus, and in Brutus, speaketh of them.

C. Claudius Pulcher, M. Perpenna.

Consuls this year, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perpenna, as witnesses Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Likewise in a capital broken monument, and in the Sicilian register. It is Pulcher and M. Perpenna. Cicero maketh mention of this Claudius as Pretor of Sicily in the fourth Oration against Verres: and as Edile Curule in his second book of Offices. So doth Pliny in his 8 book.

663

L. Martius. Sext. Julius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens name for consuls this year, L. Martius and Sext. Julius. The Sicilian records, Philip and Caesar, Eutropius and Orofius, Sex. Julius Caesar, and L. Martius Philippus. A capital fragment, Philip and Sex. Julius son of Caius. Pliny speaketh of them in his 2 book 8 chap. also in the 33 book and 3 chap. In like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

L. Julius Caesar. P. Rutilius Lupus.

According to Cassiodorus and Obsequens the Consuls this year were L. Julius Caesar, and P. Rutilius Lupus. And so it is in Padianus Velleius, and the 73 Epitome: as also in other authors who have written of the Marian war. In a fragment of the Capitol, they are seen written, Caesar, and P. Rutilius son of Rufus. In the Sicilian records, Caesar and Lupus. Cicero in his book of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth, that L. Caesar missing of an Edileship became a Consul.

L. Portius. Cn. Pompeius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, L. Portius and Cn. Pompeius. Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius (surnamed Cn. Pompeius) Verrius and L. Porcius, Cato. The Capitol fragment shew no more but Servius and Cato. Appian hath made mention of these consuls: so have Orofius and others that have penned the Marian war. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompey the Great: as Appianus witnesseth, and Padian upon the Oration against Piso.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompeius: and the same is written in Obsequens, Velleius, Eutropius, Orofius, Appian, Plutarch, and others. The Sicilian records have Sylla and Rutilius, Sylla after his victory in the civil war, would needs have himself surnamed Felix: and therefore Padian and the avouchers of the Capitol monuments, in reporting this consulat, write thus; L. Sylla, who afterwards was called Felix. The same man in his second Consulship, (which appeareth upon record in the Capitol) is named the son of Lucius, and nephew of P. Sestius. Moreover, of Q. Pompeius Rufus, Cicero maketh mention in his Brutus.

Reported there are by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers for Consuls this year L. Cinna and Cn. Octavius. Appian Velleius, and the rest, who have recorded the history of this time, name them L. Corn. Cinna, and Cn. Octavius. Plutarch writeth, that L. Cinna being of the adverse faction to L. Sylla: was by him made consul, upon condition, that he should not cross nor stand against the proceeding of the said L. Sylla: and so soon as he was entered into place of government, he began to trouble and disquiet the present state of the common-wealth, yea, intended an action against Sylla, by the means of Virginus a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sylla contemning Virginus, made an expedition against Mithridates.

L. Cinna II. C. Marius VII.

After this, were Consuls, C. Marius the seventh time, and L. Cinna the second time, according to the records of Sicily, Cassiodorus, and those that wrote of the civil war. Plutarch saith, that Marius was the first man that was seven times consul of Rome. Moreover, as it is to be read in Appian, and in the Breviaries, L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawful assembly for Election, declared themselves Consuls against this year, and the very same day that they entered into their magistracy Marius commanded Sext. Lteinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rock Tarpeia: who after he had committed many heinous crimes and outrages, ended his daies upon the Ides of January: in whose room was subordinated, L. Vell. Placcus, even he (as men think) who before-time was colleague to C. Marius in his first Consulship: of whom Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for his son Flaccus.

L. Cinna III. Cn. Papirius.

Cassiodorus witnesseth, that the Consuls succeeding in this year, were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written, that L. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two years together usurped the Consulship. Also in the book entituled Of famous persons, we read that Cinna made himself Consul a second and third time. Of these Consuls Plutarch speaketh in Sylla. Appian in Mithridatica, and in the first book of civil wars.

670

L. Cinna IV. Cn. Papirius II.

Next were Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Epitomis, L. Cinna the fourth time, and and Cn. Papirius the second time. Cicero in his Tusculan questions mentioneth Cinna four times Consul: so doth Suetonius in Caesar. And of Cn. Papirius Carbo twice Consul, the Capitol tables do yield testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for consul (not without suspicion of error) Carbo and Scribonius.

Besides the Sicilian tables, Cassiodorus, Obsequens, Appian, Eutropius, Florus, and Lactantius in his ninth book do witness that L. Scipio, and C. Norbanus were Consuls. In the Capitol fragments it is written, L. Cornelius son of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Africanus.

M. C. Marius. Cn. Carbo III.

I find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next consuls to have been C. Marius and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius was the brothers son of C. Marius seven times consul, according to Appian: but Velleius, Paterculus, Plutarch, Eutropius and others, say, that he was the son of that C. Marius: and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marius. Certainly, in the Capitol tables, he is called C. Marius, son of C. and nephew of Caius. Cicero speaketh of these Consuls against Rullus: Pliny also in his 17 book, and they who have set down in writing the civil wars of Sylla.

M. Tullius. Cn. Dolabella.

Next to those, Cassiodorus bringeth in for consuls, M. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella. Appian also reporteth that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-wealth might seem to retain some shew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be created consuls, whilst himself after the manner of King sat aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 book and 33 chap. maketh mention of M. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius consuls. In a capital fragment, this M. Tullius, son of M. nephew of A. is surnamed Decula.

674

L. Sylla II. Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers, set down for Consuls, L. Sylla the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appian saith moreover, that Sylla Dictator though he was, yet stood content and willing to be declared consul with Q. Metellus Fimbrius, to the end that the common-wealth might seem to have some likeness yet of a free state. Of these consuls, Cicero maketh mention in his Oration against Verres, and elsewhere. Gellius likewise in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Cassiodorus. This Metellus was surnamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the wars in Spain and against Sertorius: and soon he was to Nardinius.

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

The next consuls were P. Servilius and App. Claudius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their surnames were, Servius and Pulcher: of whom Appian writeth thus: that people of Rome in common manner to court S. the Dictator, requested of him that he would continue consul still another year: but S. would none of that: and took order, that Sex. If. Servius and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Consuls. In a fragment of the Capitol he is thus written: Pub. Servilius Pulcher, called also by the name of S. Pulcher, whom he took of the Laurentians, a nation in Lucania whom he subdued. My authors are Padianus upon the Oration of Cicero against Verres: Suetonius in his 14 book: Macrobius likewise in his 14 book, with others.

M. Lepidus. Q. Catulus.

M. Lepidus and Q. Catulus, are by Cassiodorus named Consuls for this year. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship and restored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to dispose of consular dignities in their solemn assemblies for elections: M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consul before Catulus, and had the preeminence above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 26 book, wherein he saith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewise, Cicero in his Oration for Cornelius Flaccus: and Livy in his Oration 2 book 3 chap. and Eutropius.

M. Aemilius. D. Brutus.

This year had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Aemilius and D. Brutus. Maecius, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Sallust, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppressed. In like sort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his second book of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Aemilius was surnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for out of the family of Livius he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, son of M. Maecius.

Cn. Octavius. C. Curia.

Verrius Flaccus setteth down for Consuls, Cn. Octavius son of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curia. The same doth Cicero report in Brutus. So do Sallust. Obsequens. Lactantius in his first book, and Pliny in his second book and and 35 chapter. Cic. in his Brutus and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chapt, make report of three Cato Curion, all Orators to wit, the father, the son, and the sons son or nephew.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, L. Octavius and C. Cotta, Obsequens, C. Anselmus and L. Octavius, Pliny in his second book and 35 chapter, Cicero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Anselmus consuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they stand to be seen, L. Octavius son of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Anselmus. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip, Padianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Caius, Marcus and Lucius.

For this years consuls, Cassiodorus registreth L. Lucullus, and M. Cotta, The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Entropius, Appianus in Mithridatic, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verres; and by Pliny in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was consul with A. Albinius, as Cicero and Plutarch do testify.

M. Lucullus, C. Cassius.

This year (by the testimony of Cassiodorus) had for consuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Cassius: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius; saying that the laws Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulged. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Entropius nameth cousin Germans by two sisters. That the surname of Cassius was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterpout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Cassius Varus, a man who had been Consul, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gellius, Cn. Lentulus.

The consuls next following, by the report of Cassiodorus, were L. Gellius and Cn. Lentulus. In like sort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and elsewhere. Plutarch also in Craffus, with Entropius and Orestes, Cassiodorus book sheweth Poplicola and Lentulus. Now the surname of L. Gellius was Poplicola, as witnesseth Omphrius.

Cn. Aufidius, P. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, Cn. Aufidius, and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers have Lentulus and Orestes. Entropius, C. Lentulus and Cn. Aufidius Orestes. This Cn. Aufidius Orestes, when he went beside a Tribuneship of the commons, was chosen consul, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Plautius. This is that P. Lentulus surnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of consular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was hanged and strangled to death when Cicero was consul, for that he had conspired with Caesar: whose grand-father was P. Lentulus President of the Senat, as Cicero saith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Caesar: as also Padianus.

M. Craffus, Cn. Pompeius.

Next to them were Coss. M. Craffus and Cn. Pompeius, according to Cassiodorus, Plutarch, Appian, and the Sicilian records, they surnames for certain, were Dives and Magnus. All the old writers speak much of this their first Consulship. Plutarch reporteth that L. Craffus attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consul. Besides, Cicero, Salust, Padian writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consuls.

Q. Metellus, Q. Hortensius.

Then followed consuls, Q. Metellus and Q. Hortensius, as Cassiodorus and the Sicilian catalogue do testify. Padianus matcheth Q. Metellus Creticus with Q. Hortensius that great Orator. Likewise, Josephus in his fourteenth book of Jewish antiquities, Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortensius, the son of Lucius, Q. Metellus afterwards upon the conquest made of Crete surnamed Creticus, was the son of L. Dalmatius, as may be gathered out of Padianus upon the Oration of Tully [called Devinatio] against Verres.

Padianus writing upon Tully's Oration against Piso; Dio likewise and Cassiodorus, join together in the consulship this year, L. Metellus and Q. Marcius. The Greek records, Marcius Rex and Metellus. This Metellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracy: that he who was substituted in his room, left this life before he entered into the government: and thereupon it was not thought good to subleed any more; and by that means Q. Marcius bare that dignity alone; and him Salust entitleth with the surname of Rex. This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creticus, as Padian witnesseth.

C. Piso, M. Glabrio.

These succeeded Consuls, C. Piso and M. Glabrio, witness Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records. And in this they follow immediately by the name of Manius Aquilius and C. Piso, Cicero in his twelfth book of Epistles to Atticus, speaketh of C. Piso and M. Acilius Glabrio, men of Consular place and calling. Padian in his commentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Piso and the law Calpurnia by him made, as touching inordinate and indirect suite after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M. Lepidus, L. Volcatius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Manius Lepidus, and with him L. Torquatus, but untruly, The Greek records have, Volcatius Tullus, Dio, L. Tullus, and Emilius Lepidus, Salust in Castrina, L. Tullus and M. Lepidus. Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, M. Lepidus and L. Volcatius. Cicero in his oration for Sulla hath L. Volcatius Tullus: so as it appeareth it should be, M. Emilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

The Consuls elect, were L. Antonius Pamphili (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitol, and not Antonius, as commonly it is read), and P. Cornelius Sulla: who being condemned for ambitious seeking after that office, and having therefore suffered condign punishment, their accusers stepped into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius son of Marcus, surnamed Cotta; and L. Manlius son of Lucius, surnamed also Torquatus: as testifieth Salust, Dio, Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white robe: and lastly, Tranquillus in Caesar.

The year next ensuing had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodorus, Padianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Caesar and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Caesar, and Lucius Marcius son of Caius, surnamed Figulus. Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: so doth Salust in Castrina. This L. Julius Caesar is his son who was Consul in the Marston war.

691

M. Cicero, C. Antonius.

The Consuls this year, were M. Tullius son of M. surnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius son of M. as testifieth Dio in his seven and thirtieth book, Cassiodorus, Salust in his Castrina oration, Vellius in his second book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 14 book 8 chapter, Pliny in his eight book and three and fiftieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of A. gustus, Appian, Entropius, Padian, and others.

There followed consuls next, D. Silanus, and L. Murana, as Cassiodorus, Salust, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius son of M. surnamed Silanus; and L. Lucius son of L. surnamed Murana. Entropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Lucius, son of that L. Murana who in quality of Pro-pretor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero saith) pleading for Murana himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Cof. In this assembly for election of Cof. L. Sergius Castrina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, in a melancholy he brake out into a conspiracy, and practised against the state: and likewise Seranus Sulpicius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murana for the crime aforesaid.

M. Pupius, M. Valerius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Valerius, The Sicilian registers, Piso and Messala. Dio, M. Pupius, son of M. surnamed Piso; and M. Valerius son of M. surnamed Messala Niger. Of this Messala Niger, there is also mention made by Padian upon the oration for Scawrus, also of M. Messala and M. Piso, in Plinius seventh book, and six and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth book, cap. second, and the eight book, chap. six and twenty. And in Caesar first book of the Gauls war, Of M. Piso Padian likewise speaketh writing upon the oration against Piso.

Q. Metellus, Q. Afranius.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers nominate for this years Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Afranius. The like doth Obsequens and Cicero in his first book of Epistles to Atticus. Dio nameth them L. Afranius son of L. and Q. Caecilius son of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as Dio witnesseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieutenants serving under him in Africa.

C. Caesar, M. Bibulus.

Cassiodorus, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do match together for consuls this year, C. Caesar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius son of C. Caesar, and M. Calpurnius, Plutarch and Appian, C. Julius Caesar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian as also Entropius and Orestes give Bibulus the forename of Lucius. Of Caesar and Bibulus, Cicero speaketh in his first book of Epistles, writing to Lentulus.

L. Piso, A. Gabinus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records shew for Consuls this year; L. Piso and A. Gabinus. Dio, L. Calpurnius son of L. Piso and A. Gabinus son of Aulus. Caesar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, L. Piso, and A. Gabinus. Caesar speaketh of them in his first book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the younger. Cicero also in his oration against Piso and for Sextus. This Piso the Consul Cicerus and Padian surname Cassiodorus, for so his grandfather before him was called, as appeareth in the capitoll records for the year 606.

P. Lentulus, Q. Metellus.

The Consuls following for this year, were by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Spinther and Q. Caelius son of Q. Metellus Nepos. Of them speaketh Valerius in his ninth book. Lentulus (qd. he) and Metellus companions in the consularship were beheld and seen both upon the stage like players; but the one of them took the surname of Spinther. One of the second sort of actors; the other, but that he had gotten the name of. Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, should have been called Pamphilus, after the name of one of a third sort, whom for all the world he resembled. Of the same men, Orosius in his first book of Epistles, and in very many of his orations. Dio also in his seventh book and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

698
Cn. Lentulus, L. Philippus.

Cassiodorus putheth down for Consuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus. Dio, Cn. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus; and L. Mureius son of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and Marcellus Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his Epistles to Lentulus. Plutarch also in the life of Cato, maketh mention of Marcus Philippus now Consul. This Cn. Lentulus was the son of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero saith in his Brevium. And surname he was Marcellus, and not Claudius; that it might be known, of what family of the Claudii he was descended.

696
Cn. Pompeius, M. Crassus.

When as by the obstinate persistence of C. Cato Tribun of the commons, (who ever interpreted his negative) there could be no ordinary assembly holden for the creation of magistrats, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: so as upon an Interregency between Cn. Pompeius was chosen Consul, and with him M. Crassus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witness. Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied and presented, was in the common place by violence throughly beaten; and Cato himself wounded. These Cons. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, son of Cn. Magnus the second time, and M. Crassus son of Publius Crassus, the second time. Of them Padian, Plutarch, the Sicilian records, and others make mention.

Cn. Claudius, L. Domitius.

Dio in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700, following the computation of Varro, avoucheth Consuls, Appius Claudius, son of Appius Pulcher; and L. Domitius son of Cn. Ahenobarbus. Cassiodorus and Orosius, name them, App. Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Ahenobarbus; and Padian upon the Oration for Scævius; L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domitius, son of Cn. Ahenobarbus, Cicero speaketh in the eight book of Cicero's Epistles.

Cn. Domitius, M. Messala.

Against this year there stood in election and laboured with much earnestness and ambitious desire to be Consuls, Cn. Minucius, Cn. Domitius M. Messala and M. Scævius, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the last, even in the seventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregency, M. Messala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been chosen then; but that Q. Pompeius Rufus a Tribun of the commons, who still opposed himself to hinder and defer all election, and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the rest as many as went about to cross the said election. This much Dio, But Appian saith, that the common-weal continued for eight months space in Anarchy without any sovereign magistrats of state. Plutarch writeth, that in this so great extremity of danger, Lucius a Tribun of the commons; preferred a bill for the creating of Cn. Pompeius Dictator, who should redress all enormities; and set upright the state again; but Cato gainstaid it, and so nothing was effected. Dio saith moreover, that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the choosing not of a Dictator only, but also of military Tribuns in consular authority; but through the earnest labour of Pompeius, Consuls were created, Messala and Calpurnius, which surnames stand to be seen upon the Sicilian records. Also in the capitoll monuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domitius Mureius, son of M. nephew of Marcus, anno 708 and 707.

702

Cn. Pompeius, Q. Metellus.

When by reason of the contentions among so mighty competitors, the Consuls could not be created by the Calends of January: there passed an Act of the Senat, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by vertue whereof Cn. Pompeius was by the Interregency Serv. Sulpicius created Consul the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue first, and presently entred upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Consulship for the five last months of the year behind, Q. Caelius Pius Metellus Scipio, his Wives father. Thus writeth Padian upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo; Plutarch likewise, Appianus and Dio. This Metellus Pius Scipio was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, son of Nasica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Calvus in the familiar Epistles of Cicero, Q. Caelius son of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus, Ser. Sulpicius.

Against this year were Consuls created, M. Marcellus, and Ser. Sulpicius, as Cassiodorus, Plutarch, and Appian witness. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus. Dio nameth them Servius Sulpicius son of Q. surname Rufus, and M. Claudius son of M. surname also Marcellus. Of these Consuls Suetonius also maketh mention in Caesar: likewise Cicero in his Epistles, and the Epitome 118. This Marcellus was the cousin german of that Marcellus who the year next following was Consul: and brother german to him who two years after bare the Consulship, as may be collected out of Ferrinus, Flaccus, Dio, and Suetonius.

L. Paulus, C. Marcellus.

There succeeded Consuls, L. Paulus, and C. Marcellus: witness Cassiodorus, Dio Suetonius, Horius in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of these is by Dio named L. Aemilius, son of Marcus, surname Paulus; the other by Cicero in his Epistles, C. Claudius son of Cn. Marcellus. Dio writeth, that this man by some was reported to be adversus, i.e. the brothers son, others advocatus, i.e. the brother of Mar. Marcellus. But S. Iovius saith plainly, he was the brothers son.

705

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus, as also Appian, Plutarch, Horius, Florus, and Cicero in his Epistles do testify. Dio calleth these Consuls

L. Cornelius, son of Publius Lentulus; and C. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitoll it is to be leen thus, C. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Marcellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Cris, who as Calvus testifieth in the former election took a repulse, and by Cicero is called in the Oration against Vatinius, Flamen Martialis.

C. Caesar, P. Servilius.

When Cn. Caesar the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Consuls there were created Cn. Julius, son of Cn. Caesar, and Pub. Servilius, son of Publius Isauricus. For now was the year come, when as Caesar by the laws might be chosen Consul: for so in the third book of his own Commentaries he saith himself, and so Dio in his one and fortieth book, Plutarch, Tranquillus, Appianus and Cassiodorus do testify of him. But he meant that law which expressly forbad and debarred, that no man might be within ten years space chosen Cons. twice. As for Publius Servilius, he was the son of that Publius Servilius that first took the surname Isauricus, who this year bare his Consulship at Rome, while Caesar warred in Macedonia.

Q. Fufius Calenus, P. Vatinius.

Dio saith, That the people of Rome having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earnestly that there might pass as honourable decrees for Caesar the Conqueror as possible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Consul five years together, and Dictator not for six months as before-time, but a whole year; and ended with the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Caesar, albe it he was without Id. Id. immediately entred upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordained under him for his General of the horse, Mar. Antonius, a man who yet had not been Prætor. This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cicero in his second Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Caesar took upon him this Dictatorship and the rest following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Caesar's praise in Dio: wherein he saith, that Caesar was created Dictator to make head against the enemies, and therefore the troubles and dissensions of war was the cause of this creation. But certain it is that Caesar became Dictator for another cause, namely that by the means of that sovereign power, he might draw unto himself alone the whole managing and government of the State, which beforetime had been administered by many persons. But Dio addeth moreover and saith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Prætors nor Consuls created. For Marcus Antonius General of the horse, arrayed in his purple robes, with six Lictors, making way before him, resembled a certain shew of the ancient liberty. But within a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Master of the horse, he left Lu. Caesar an aged man, Provost and governor of Rome. Howbeit, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Egypt, when King Ptolemeus was slain, and Pharnaces K. of Pontus vanquished: Consuls were created, Q. Ensius, son of Quintus, Calenus and Pub. Vatinius, son of Publius. And these the Capitoll tables do shew, and Cassiodorus also. Of Publius Vatinius Consul, Macrobius in his second book maketh mention,

Y y y certain

708

C. Caesar. M. Lepidus.

Verrins in his capitoll tables setteth forth Consuls of this year, only without ever a Dictator. The stone record of Colonia, whereof Onuphrius speaketh here, nameth C. Julius Caesar the third time, and M. Emilius Lepidus. But Dio in his three and fortieth book, The next year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorship and the Consul both, the third time, and took unto him for his Colleague in both Magistracies, M. Emilius Lepidus. Of the same mind seemeth Tranquillus to be in Caesar, chap. seventy six. Likewise Hirtius in the fit book, But Onuphrius suppoeth that both Tranquillus and Dio, yea, and Hirtius also was in an error. For with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Enriprius agree: who write that Caesar this year was Consul the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictator the second time.

C. Caesar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitoll marbles, do shew unto us that Caesar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whom Dio differeth: who doth report that this year Caesar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time Master of the horse: also that Lepidus tellow Consul with Caesar, declared himself against all law, Generall of the horse. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Consuls this year, there is to be seen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Caesar bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewise his fourth Consul with out Colleague. In that history also it appeareth, that Caesar presently entred upon his fourth Consul. But bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he resigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Caesar was the fourth time Consul, and that without a Colleague: as Sigonius maketh interpretation. For Cyprianus Kalender. together with the Sicilian registers, do shew that Caesar was Consul now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Caesar, who being Consul elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain. As for Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Consul. Dio saith moreover, that Caesar upon the death of Q. Fabius the Consul, declared the very last day of the year, C. Caninius to be the Consul for those few hours that were behind. Whereof Cicero in his seventh book of Epistles, writing to Curius, Macrobius in his second book of Saturallia, Tacitus in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his seventh, and Suetonius in Caesar do make report.

C. Caesar. M. Antonius.

Dio setteth down for this year Caesar Dictator the fifth time, together with M. Emilius Lepidus Master of the horse. But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Dio and Appian write that he created himself Consul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers give records that Caesar was this year Consul the fifth time, together with M. Antonius. And Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colotian tables, that C. Caesar was Consul the fifth time, with M. Antonius son of M. and that in the room of Caesar there was chosen P. Cornelius son of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Caesar himself (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room. Plutarch writeth, that Caesar Consul now the fifth time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have subordained Dolabella in his own stead, Antonius grained it in an oration: and afterwards, when Caesar a second time would have had Dolabella to be declared Consul, and still Antonius crossed and withstood it, Caesar gave over his enterprise. But after Caesar was murdered, Antonius (as Dio writeth) fearing some insurrection and commotion if he should have rejected Dolabella, took him into the fellowship of government. Appian saith, that immediately after Caesar was killed, Dolabella entred into the Magistracy. So saith Velleius also. And this verily was the year, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Caesar, whereof the captains were M. and Decimus both Brutus, C. Trebonius & C. Cassius: and upon the fiftenth day of March, when he sat in Council together with the Senat in the court of Pompey, he was was stabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat seized the capitoll. And C. Octavius his nephew, or fifters son, whom Caesar had made in his will his half-her, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither Caesar had sent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took up on him the name of Caesar, according to his last will and testament.

C. Pansa. A. Hirtius.

Dio Cassiodorus, and the rest, nominate Consuls for this year, C. Vibius Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtius, son of Julius. Cyprianus book sheweth Cretonius and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonius was the surname of Pansa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, son of Caius, and A. Hirtius, son of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their sons who were out-lawed by Sulla, and whom Caesar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honorable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Caesar elected and defined thereto, before he was slain. Dio, Appian, and others report, that of these two Consuls, Hirtius in the time of the civil war, in a battell before Modena against Antonius was slain: and Pansio some daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Pansa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Consul, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtius, took unto him for his Colleague Q. Papius.

M. Lepidus. L. Plancus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records put down for Consuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancus. Dio, M. Emilius son of Lucius surnamed Plancus. Of these Consuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, saying, That Tiberius was born after the battell of Philippi: when Mar. Emilius Lepidus was the second time Consul with Manatius Plancus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this year by Caesar, D. Brutus and Lu. Plancus. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedus condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs usurped the rule of the common-weal: agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who before time also had been Consul with Caesar in his third Consulship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antonius, had revolted from the Common-weal) administer the Consul. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras called Albinus: I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporated into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civil war, Brutus and Cassius were slain in battell before Philippi; as Dio, Plutarch, Appian, and others write.

713

P. Servilius II. L. Antonius.

The Colotian tables, Dio, and Cassiodorus match Consuls together for this year, Lu. Antonius son of Marcus, surnamed Pietas, and P. Servilius son of Publius, surnamed Isternicus, the second time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writeth in Tiberius, This P. Servilius was first Consul with Caesar in his second Consulship: whose latter Isternicus died a little before, as Dio and Ensebius report. As for L. Antonius, named here by Dio Pietas, for that being Consul, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Maximus managed the affairs of it with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionate conduct, he challenged the surname of Pietas.

Cn. Domitius. C. A. Antonius.

A Colotian table, Dio, and Cassiodorus joyne in the Consulship of this year, Cn. Domitius son of Marcus, surnamed Calvus, the second time; and C. A. Antonius son of Caius, surnamed Pietas. Of these Josephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the Jews antiquities and three and twenty chapter. Toward the end of this year, Dio writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Consuls were substituted for those few daies that were to come: and one of them was L. Cornilius Ballus surnamed Gadus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordained Consuls stand under their names, L. Cornilius son of Lucius, and P. Canidius son of Lucius. Of Pub. Cornelius Ballus Consul, Plutarch writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleius in his second book.

Cassiodorus inquired for the next Consuls, L. Cornificius and Cn. C. Calpurnius. The Sicilian records have Cornificius and Sabinus. Dio, L. Martius and C. S. Brutus. C. S. surnamed Calvus is named by Dio in the common-weal table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly, but amiss, Asinius.

716

Ap. Claudius. C. Norbanus.

Consuls that follow, were Ap. Claudius and C. Norbanus as Cyprianus saith. But as the Sicilian registers purport, C. Serranus and Sabinus: as Dio writeth, Ap. Claudius son of Caius, Pulcher; and C. Norbanus, son of C. Sabinus Plancus. As touching L. Aemilius the Consul elect, and substitute in the room of another, who before he entred into government being terrified with the minatory threats of C. Caesar, threw himself down headlong, and to brake his neck, see Tranquillus in Augustus.

717

M. Agrippa. L. Caninius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian registers Agrippa and Gallus. Dio, M. P. P. P. son of Lucius, Gallus, Josephus in his fiftenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Consuls, Mar. Agrippa and C. Caninius Gallus. Neppi also in the life of Atticus, calleth Vipsianus Agrippa. In the capitoll marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentle name is passed over, and namely, in the forefront of the Temple, called Pantheon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa son of Lucius, Consul the third time. Tacitus also in his first book mentioneth this Agrippa.
Y y y y marbles

718
L. Gellius, M. Cocceius.

Agrippodorus nameth for Consuls this year, L. Gellius and M. Cocceius. The Sicilian records shew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath Lu. Gellius son of Lucius Popiculus, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellius was the son of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dionysius, Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Messala. For it is the time man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus whereby it may be understood, that Popiculus was his surname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellii but the Valerii; that carried the surname of Publicola. The same fragments do shew, that the said Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his room. And happily it was L. Munatius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, saith to have been twice Consul: but in what year he was the second time a man cannot find, unless it were in this.

719
Sext. Pompeius, L. Cornificius.

Agrippodorus and the Sicilian records testifie, that this years Consuls were Sext. Pompeius and L. Cornificius. Dio L. Cornificius son of Lucius, and Sextus Pompeius son of Sextus. This year Sext. Pompeius son of Cicero was slain.

M. Antonius, L. Scribonius Libo.

Agrippodorus putteth down for Consuls, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Atratinus. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius son of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribonius son of Lucius Libo. The same Dio saith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of January gave over the Magistracy and substituted in his own self Lu. Scribonius Atratinus: and therefore may there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Atratinus that was Consul this year with Libo. That Consuls also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Aemilius Consul, for one part of the year; and that he built a stately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Consulship.

721
C. Caesar, L. Volcatius.

Agrippodorus exhibiteth unto us for Consuls, C. Caesar and L. Volcatius. Dio, Caesar the second time, and L. Volcatius son of Lucius Tullus. They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very unjustly set down Caesar and Cicero for this years Consuls. Of this Consulship of Caesar, Suetonius and Dio speak, saying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius also beforetime. Instead of Caesar was Lu. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entituled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Caesar II. L. Volcatius,
Kal. Januarii, L. Antonius,
Kal. Maii, L. Flavius,
Kal. Iulii, M. Atilius,
C. Fontius,
Kal. Sept. L. Vinicius,
Kal. Octob. L. Lenonius,
Of L. Flavius made Consul by M. Antonius, and deposed Dio likewise maketh mention.

Cn. Domitius, C. Sossus.

Agrippodorus nominateth for Consuls this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Sossus. The Sicilian records, Exobarbus and Sossus. Dio Cn. Domitius son of Cn. Domitius, nephew of Cn. Exobarbus; and C. Sossus son of C. Sossus, nephew of Cn. Nepos writeth, that Atticus died, when Cn. Domitius and C. Sossus were Consuls.

723
C. Caesar II., M. Messala.

Agrippodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, C. Caesar the second time, and M. Messala. The Sicilian registers, Othavians and Corvinus. Dio, Caesar the third time, and M. Valerius son of Marcus, surnamed Messala Corvinus; and that right truly. For C. Agrippodorus maketh no reckoning of that Consulship of Caesar which he bare with Pedius, because he was subordinated in the place with another. But Dio and Appian do witness that Caesar and Antony were married together this year, both of them in their second Consulship, at what time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Consuls beforehand for eight years next ensuing: howbeit, in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Consulship, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Messala declared Consul. As touching the Consuls this year subordinated, thus we find written in the ancient inscriptions:

Emperor Caesar III. M. Valerius,
Kal. Maii, M. Titus,
Kal. Octobris, Cn. Pompeius.

C. Caesar III., M. Crassus.

Agrippodorus nameth for this years Consuls, C. Caesar the third time, and M. Crassus. The Sicilian records Othavians and Crassus. Dio, Caesar the fourth time, and M. Licinius son of Marcus Crassus. He added moreover, and saith, Caesar in the midst of that water crossed the seas out of Macedonia into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Consul with M. Crassus. Orosius likewise noteth, that Caesar called Emperor, was Consul the fourth time with M. Licinius Crassus. Of other Consuls substituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inscriptions,

Emperor Caesar IV. M. Licinius,
Kal. Jul. C. Antistius,
Ibid. Septembr. M. Tullius,
Kal. Novembr. L. Senius.

Of M. Tullius Consul with Augustus, Dio maketh mention in his story of this years acts. Pliny also in his 22 book and 6 chap. and Plutarch in Cicero. By Velleius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antistius had for addition the surname of Vetus and Senius of Sevinius.

725
C. Caesar III., Sex. Apuleius.

In Agrippodorus the Consuls be C. Caesar the fourth time, and Sext. Apuleius. In Dio, Caesar the fifth time, and Sext. Apuleius son of Sext. In the Sicilian records, Othavians and Apuleius: in the Antique inscriptions, Emperor Caesar the fifth time, and Sext. Apuleius. Dio saith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Caesar five times Consul, there is to be seen an old Epigram or inscription in this manner.

Senatus Populusque Romanus,
Imp. C. Divi Julii Fil. C. C. Quinte,
C. C. Desig. Sext. Imp. Sept.
Resp. conferuere.

That is,
The Senat and people of Rome. By Emperor Caesar, son of Julius of famous memory, Consul five times, elect Consul the sixth time, and Emperor the seventh, the Commonwealth saved.

C. Caesar V., M. Agrippa II.

Agrippodorus declareth for Consuls this year, Caesar the fifth time, and M. Agrippa the second time. Orosius and the Sicilian records, Caesar the sixth time, and Agrippa the second time. Dio, Caesar the sixth time, and M. Agrippa the third time: but it is to be read the second time, as Sigonius advertiseth, so as the next year it should be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the superscription of that Temple (which he erected and named Pantheon) in this form, [M. Agrippa son of L. third time Consul built it.] For Dio saith, that this Temple was finished two years after that he was Consul with Agrippa the seventh time Consul, in which year himself bare his third Consulship, and not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said Temple, he would have written, [Consul the fourth time.]

C. Caesar VI., M. Agrippa III.

Agrippodorus saith, that the next Consuls were Caesar the sixth time, and Mar. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Caesar the seventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written Othavians the seventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

C. Augustus Caesar VII., T. Statilius.

Agrippodorus putteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the seventh time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments, Othavians the eighth time, and Taurus. Dio, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the second time. For he had been Consul first, for a part of the year, anno 727 and now is the second time: of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero; Nero took to wife Statilia Messalina, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Taurus, one who had been twice Consul, and also triumphant: he writeth also, that Augustus entered upon his eighth and ninth Consul at Tarraco.

C. Caesar Augustus VIII., M. Silvanus.

Agrippodorus sheweth for Consuls next, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silvanus. Dio and the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time, and M. Silvanus. A fragment of the capitoll, Emperor Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silvanus. This year Augustus Caesar was Emperor the eighth time, and shut up the Temple of Janus the fourth time now that ever it was shut: which he had let open before in regard of certain wars, as Dio reporteth.

C. Caesar Augustus IX., C. Norbanus.

Agrippodorus putteth down for this years Consuls, Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Augustus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio and a fragment of the capitoll make Augustus the tenth time and C. Norbanus Florent. This Norbanus seemeth to be the son of C. Norbanus the Consul, anno 716, for he had not the numerical note testifying a second Consulship.

C. Caesar Augustus X., Cn. Piso.

Agrippodorus setteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the tenth time, and Cn. Piso. The Sicilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Piso. And Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius son of Cn. Piso. By a fragment of the capitoll stone it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time, together with Aulus Terentius Varro Murena: also that Murena died in his Magistracy, in whose stead was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piso; of which matter Dio thus writeth: Augustus went to the Alban hill, and there resigned up the Consulship. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever since the time that the C.W. was set in frame and established, had born the yearly Magistracy, he thought that from thence forwards he was to forbear the same; to the end, that the honourable dignity of Consuls should be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, because he would not be hindered and letted in the actions; and therewith substituted in his place Lucius Sestius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus; who also wrote of his praises and commendable parts.

M. Marcellus, L. Arminius.

This year had for Consuls, as faith Castellodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Arminius; as Dio, M. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus, and Agrrippinus son of Lucius. In the Capitoll table these Consuls are thus set down, L. Arminius son of L., nephew of L., and M. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Consuls are not well put down to be Octavianus the twelfth time, and Arminius. In this year, the conspiracy of Pannius Capio and Varro Marviana against Augustus was discovered; and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witness Dio.

M. Lollius, Q. Lepidus.

The Colotian stone and Castellodorus shew for this year Consuls, Q. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Lollius. Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicily, and the people of Rome at the assembly for Consuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion. For M. Lollius only entered upon the government, by reason that the other place was reserved and kept for Augustus; but when he made refusal, Q. Lepidus was created. Of these Consuls Horace in his first book of Epistles writeth thus:

Me quater undenos sciat implevisse Decembres, Collegam Lepidum quo dixit Lollius anno.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was this year,
At Rome when Consul Lollius, chose Lepidus his peer.

M. Apuleius, P. Silius.

After Castellodorus, the Consuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silius. But in Dio, M. Apuleius son of Sex-tus, and Publius Silius son of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerva.

735

C. Sentius, Q. Lucretius.

The Colotian stone, Ensebin in his treatise of Times, Dio and Castellodorus set forth as Consuls this year, Caius Sentius, son of Caius, Saturninus and Quintus Lucretius son of Quintus Pispillo. Of this years consuls thus writeth Dio, Caius Sentius was declared Consul: but for that there was to be given him a companion, and Augustus refused the second place of Consulship reserved for him, there arose a sedition, until Augustus pronounced Consul Quintus Lucretius one of the Embassadors, whom the Senat had sent unto him about the appeasing of the foresaid sedition; notwithstanding he was a man in times past proscribed and outlawed. The same writeth Velleius in the second book. In the broken Colotian stone it is to be read, that the Consul elected instead of Sentius Saturninus, was Mar. Vinicius son of Marcus, Velleius, unto Vinicius adjoyneth as Colleague, Agrippa. In this year, after the first ten years were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Censorial authority and dignity, he was created a second time by the people over-seer of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and resumed the Censors power for the same time, and the Consular authority for ever. So as, at all times, and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and sit with the Consuls.

Cn. Lentulus, P. Lentulus.

Publius Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellinus and Cn. Cornelius son of Lucius are set down for Consuls by the Colotian stone table; by Dio also and Castellodorus. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperour Caesar Augustus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunian power for five years.

737

C. Furnius, C. Silanus.

Here succeeded Consuls next, according to Castellodorus, C. Furnius and C. Silanus. After Dio, C. Furnius son of C. and C. Junius son of Caius Silanus. But in the Colotian fragment, C. Furnius son of Caius, and C. Junius. Whiles C. Furnius and C. Junius Silanus were Consuls, the solemn plaies, called Seculares were now the first time let out by Augustus, as Comperinus and Dio affirm.

Castellodorus nameth for Consuls, Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Cornelius. Dio, L. Domitius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, Enobarbus; and P. Cornelius son of P., nephew of Publius Scipio. In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it standeth, that for P. Cornelius there was substituted L. T., i.e. Tiberius; of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chapter writeth thus, L. Tiberius Rufus, a man most able for his parentage, parentage, deserved a Consul under Augustus Caesar of happy memory, only for his military service. In this Consuls year was the Quinquennial solemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in memoriall of the Empire of Augustus and Agrippa one of the Quindecemvirs, had the ordering and setting out thereof.

M. Valerius, M.F.,
C. Volgius, C.F.,
Suff. C. Caninius.

Likewise in Cuspinian his Calender, these Consuls are written with their surnames:

M. Vala Quirinus,
Rebula Saturninus,
Maximus Tubero.

M. Drusus, L. Piso.

The Consuls next following, were M. Drusus and L. Piso, as Castellodorus faith. The Sicilian registers name them Libo and Piso. Dio, M. Livius son of Lucius, Drusus Libo; and L. Calphurnius son of Lucius Piso, M. Drusus son of Marcus. L. according to the Colotian fragment.

740

Cn. Lentulus, M. Crassus.

This year next following had for Consuls, after Castellodorus, and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Crassus whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius son of Marcus Crassus; and Cn. Cornelius son of Cnatus Lentulus. The Colotian fragment sheweth Marcus Licinius son of Marcus.

T. Nero, P. Quintilius

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilius were Consuls this year, as Castellodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varus in the Sicilian Catalogue, and Dio calleth them Titus Claudius son of Tiberius Nero; and P. Quintilius, son of Sexsus Varus. The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Claudius son of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Consulship but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus Caesars wives son, who after the death of Augustus, attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

M. Messala, P. Sulpitius.

Castellodorus putteth down for Consuls, Messala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Messala and Quirinus. Dio, M. Valerius son of Marcus, Messala Barbatus; and P. Sulpitius son of Publius Quirinus: of whom Suetonius in Claudius, and Tacitus in his second book write. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Josephus in the seventeenth book of antiquities and first chapter, is said to have born the Consular dignity, and was Lieutenant in Syria. At which time, our Lord Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was born: of whom Saint Luke maketh mention, saying, This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus President and governour of Syria. After these Consuls, others were substituted in their place, as the Colotian stone sheweth, wherein it is thus read:

By which it appeareth that Rebula and Saturninus were the surnames of Caninius & Volgius. By a fragment of the capitoll marble it is evident, that the surnames of Valerius was Aemilianus; of Volgius, Rufus; and Rebula of Caninius; and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valerius, so Rebula instead of Rufus. There remaineth also the memoriall of Rebula and Saturninus in the Sicilian records. In this year, Dio reporteth, that Augustus was a second time made over-seer for mens manners and demeanours five years more; and that he resumed still the same authority by times; as also the Empire, and therein Agrippa died.

P. Fabius, Q. Aelius.

Castellodorus exhibiteth for this years Consuls, Paulus Fabius and Q. Aelius. Dio, Paulus Fabius, son of Quintus Maximus and Tubero. Of Q. Aelius Tubero, and P. Fabius Maximus Consuls, Frontinus speaketh of in his book of water-conduits; and Pliny in his eighth book and seventh chapter, where he writeth, that the Theater of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tubero and Fabius Max. were Consuls.

744

Julius Antonius, Q. Fabius.

Castellodorus nameth for Consuls this year, Julius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius. Dio, Jul. Antonius Africanus, and Q. Fabius son of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian Catalogue and Calender of Cuspinian, shew Africanus and Maximus. Dio nameth Julius, the son of Antonius. Unto him Horace writeth in this manner:

*Pindarum quisquis studet amulari
Iule, cerat is ope Dadalus, Nictur pennis &c.*

With wings devis'd by Dadalus
And glew'd with wax, they flee:
Who strive (O Iule) with Pindarus
To match his Poetry.

And after,
Tendis (Anton) quates in alas
Nubium trahis.

— O Antonius, so swift
As he doth mount the clouds aloft.

745 Drusus Nero, Titus Quintus.

Here succeeded Coss. according to Cassiodorus, Drusus Nero, and T. Quintus; but after Dionysius, Nero Claudius, son of Tiberius Drusus and T. Quintus, son of Titus Crispinus, Drusus and Crispinus, by Culpinian Calender and the Sicilian registers. This Drusus brother of Tiberius Nero was Augustus Caesar's wives son; who being Consul, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the surname of Germanicus, as Dio writeth; which addition the Senat gave him first of that Province, as Ensepius saith. With the death of this Drusus endeth Livy's histories: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Look in the said Breviary.

To the Reader.

I doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story above-written, will presently grow into a liking of the very place, which hath afforded so worthy persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to see the river Tyberis, these seven hills, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. The journey they have found, for way long and tedious; for expense of money heavy and chargeable; for hazard of religion, conscience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: for degenerate are the inhabitants now from that ancient people so devout, so virtuous and incorrupt, in oldtime. To satisfy the Readers in this behalf, and to avoid the perill of that travell, I thought it not amiss to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to say, the description of the places, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of those antique buildings, mentioned in the story aforesaid. And forasmuch as Bartholomew Marlianus hath herein taken pains, and made a Treatise thereof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memory, Francis the French King, the first (I take it) of that name: and for that those learned men, who last set Livy forth in print, have thought good to adorn thereto, as a necessary dependant, the foresaid Treatise: I for my part, having struggled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in some sort overcome them; crossed Rhine, and the Pois passed over the hills Olympus and Æmus, and forwaded through the rough freights of Thetis and Tempe, seem now I would not at my return to stick at the pleasant mount, Palatine, Capitol, Aventin, &c. with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tyber and Mars field underneath, beautified especially with such flatly Temples, triumphal Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Circuses, Columns, and Colosses, wonders of the world. And albeit I found Marlian far unlike himself, and the book that goeth in his name much corrupt in the print, yet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the faults, and endeavoured that our English edition might in some measure be answerable to the Latine.

A Summary collected by John Bartholomew Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millan, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

The First Book.

CHAP. I.

The Situation of the City.

Before we enterprise to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortal gods; with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their first ground and make their entrance.

The Capitol hill, where it is broadest, exceedeth not 800 foot in length; it lyeth out toward the Northwest 150. It hath a point or wing on either side in fashion of a semicircle; and in compais containeth well-near seven furlongs.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with four angles of unequal sides, containing 1500 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill: a second of seven hundred foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Calvus: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lists or show-place, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second side thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Subura, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both sides, between the Capitol, the Forum Nove, and the mount Calvus: in like manner from the said mount Calvus and Palatine, Subura and the Esquilina, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcelline. A second plain there is, under under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which stretcheth out 500 foot from the mount it self, as far as to the Tyber; and anon over-against the valley from the crooked reach and confluence of the river, and the nook whereby the Aventine is divided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards between the said hills it groweth narrow, until it come to Cololus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Calvus only by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Calvus.

Then followeth the mount Calvus (separate from the Palatine by a plain) resembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the base thereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the time it is by the street Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Calvus and Cololus lying out in length 4 Stadia and within a while to the wals which joyn close to the mount Calvus as far as to the gate Agnaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast. From hence the wals meet afront for the space of two Stadia, even to the gate Navia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast, it is parted from the Esquilina by the street Labicana: and anon shewing it self afront near S. Marcelline, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover the Calvus is enclosed within the said valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City wals: and hath in compais well-near a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to contain two hills: the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wals, and anon near the gate Hofstensis, is divided and cut with a crooked street-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque and the mount Calvus: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Calvus by the street Appia, until you come to the gate Capena. It had in compais 18 Stadia, as Dionysius also testifieth; and on the Southeast, a most spacious and large plain of 4 unequal sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Stadia, Westward five, somewhat less Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Esquilina on the South part is divided with the street Labicana; on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Calvus, Palatine, and it self: on the North the Subura; and from the Viminal hill, the street called Patricius parteth it, until a man come to the bath of Diocles. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form: inasmuch as Farrus (not without good reason) thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the West side regardeth the Quirinal, having about a furlong space the plain Subura lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the same hills there lyeth as it were 4 ingera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Esquilina along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compais thereof taketh up two miles and an half: the form thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militarium] for the space of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the level plot of the City which lieth Westward: but on the right hand (as clearly appeareth by that which we have said) it is opposite to the Viminalis on the third side Northward, for the space of 6 Stadia, it lieth to the hill called [Hortulorum]. It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 ingera, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compais it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old pomary of the city: for the space of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flaminiana to Collina, a full mile more than any other hill. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculum, on the other side of Tyber: the one half thereof and not above is contained within the wals: from the Vatican plain, for the space of 3 Stadia, whereas it stretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the wals, for the compais of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the same nature which purrth forth two points like horns: the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compais whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and base plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia at this day on the Northeast side (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a straight and direct line being drawn for two Stadia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Pierre of Domitian called Nymphaea: along the bank of Tyberis, over-against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven sides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is let the valley Martia, namely as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis: so as the breadth draweth narrower still unto the gate Flaminia.

There resteth yet the Transtiberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compais about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channel of Tyberis; which entering into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soon after by little and little turneth from the North, Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavity, the Mars field. Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile (Hadrian) returning to his former course, as far as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuensis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the situation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memorial of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II.

Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK, and Inhabitants thereof.

The region (on which Rome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenonymus the son of Lycanor, came into the laid quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelagians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) until the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that feignory and kingdom. Long time after, Saturn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sickle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely scotfed by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who forsook the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth: received of Faunus the K. of the Aborigines, a portion of ground: built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elys their native country was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived along time according to their own laws and customs, until they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one commonly. Then reigned Latinus the son of Faunus, until such time as Evander the son of Anchises, after the overthrow and final ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instinct of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wife, and so was by Latinus admitted into the society and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joynted together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Eneas wored upon by Turnus: for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Eneas won the victory, and in single combat slew Turnus. At that time also Latinus died, and left his son in law Eneas heir to the crown. certain years after was Eneas killed by Meczentius K. of the Tuscan; and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius. After him followed Kings, Eneas Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Carys, Capetus, Tyberinus, Agrippas, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Numitor. This Numitor usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of elderhood was due to his brother Numitor. And for fear lest there might arise from his brothers off-spring, some one to make claim and recover the royal seat, and thereby himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vesta, for to be a professed Nun, she being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetual virginity, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Numitor advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish. Found they were by Faustulus a shepherd upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Fauslula fostered and brought up among other shepherds, Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters son. And at the very time came Romulus also with Fauslulus in place, purposing to rescue Remus his brother. Soon they entered into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandfere Numitor. In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the sovereignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

The form and bigness of the City of Romulus.

Romulus set out the City four square, as Plutarch witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata. Others affirm, that the form and compass thereof is uncertain and by reason of An was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomerium. Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the beast-market: from whence in certain places were stories pitched and set between, along the bottom of the mount Palatine, as to the altar of Consius: and so within a while to the old Curia: then, to the Chappel of the Ves, and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, until a place was assigned for the walls, and a spacious plot to build the City upon.

Thus Latinus began the wall from the rock Carmenalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber. From thence Southward unto the farthest part of the grand Circus: and so Northward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerva, and in the end joynted it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitol itself, and also the Palatine. And finally, to enlarge the City, he set to it the hills Quirinalis and Capit.

CHAP. IIII.

The gates of Romulus his City.

Romulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmenalis, Romana, and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto to wit Janialis.

Carmenalis took the name of Carmen the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmenalis stood before the gate. This gate stood under the Capitol on the right hand. Between the cliff Tarp and the Tyber, over against the Church now of S. Katherine, toward the sheew-place of Minu. This was afterwards named Sclerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat passed, for the sending of the three hundred Fabi to Crem, who went forth at this gate, and were slain every one at Crem.

Romana was so called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary, not far from the angle of the mount Palatine, in the bottom of the cliff of Ves. Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Magonia, of the loving of king and ex. no others name it Trigonia, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The same also was called Libera or Romulida. The place to it they assigne, where the gate Sau stood, bearing the name of the old City so called and after destroyed.

Janialis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off. It stood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V.

The variety of the compass and walls of the City.

When the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and others while defended themselves against their violence, it hapned for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occasion, the City built by Romulus, was not sufficient to receive so great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Capitol and the Esguine, and so enlarged it. Afterwards when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome, An made a second enlargement of the City, and granted these new comers the mount Aventine to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabins in Capitolium; the Albans in Capitol; and this new-come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joynted Janiculus also to the city by a wooden bridge made over the Tyber: and call a trench called Fossa Quiritum about the low and level places of the city. So the Trans-tyberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more spacious and stately: last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoining the hills Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid. Tullius the prond was the first that enclosed it with a wall of good ashler stone. And the very same wall which stand at this day, were by the posterity that followed, repaired and redified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it flourished in greatest glory, extended far more in bounds and compass, For in Plinius time the circuit thereof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compass of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spread far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the said Plinius time, was 50 miles.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.
The Pomery of the City.

THAT void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomery. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomery was oftentimes let out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors. But none had power granted so to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with some singular and especial benefit; as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, so no set bounds confined either the City or the Pomery.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be seen: those also that are now extant.

EVEN as the bounds of the City and Pomeryum were many times altered, so the gates also; some were left within the City, by occasion that the walls were farther set out and lost their names; others in time were so old, that they fell down; and albeit their name remain, yet the place wherethey stood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names, or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were some that had two names; and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana, or Flaminia.
Nomentana, or Viminalis.
Esquilina, or Taurina.
Capena, or Appia.
Tergemina, or Hofstensis.
Ratumena, or Vientana.
Carmentalis, Magonia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduscula, Saginalis, Sanchalis, Collatina, Intergeres, Tiburina, Gabinia, Latina, Aurelia, Calatoria, Laurentis, Fontinalis, Lovernalis, Ferentina, Minutina, Salutaria, Mutia, Picaculata, Preneftina, Liburnensis, Aleria, and Tarpeia.

Flumentana took name of the river Tyberis; for it stood at the first upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridge of Xystus, in the end of the Broad Street, and at the head of the way or street Flaminia; but afterwards, translated it more to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the cauley of Flaminus: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is situate in the hill Hortulorum.

Collatina bare the name of Collatia, a town not far from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincius a senator, whose name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortulorum: between it and Flumentana is a mile space.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinus; or because in old time the way lay through it, for them that went to the hill Quirinalis. It seemeth to be called Agonensis, quasi Agon, i.e. without a corner; afterwards, Collina: and at the last, Salutaria; for that by it salt was carried into the City. This name it holdeth still and standeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis distant 5 Stadia; so named, as they say, of a wood of Ofers, which (as it is supposed) sometime grew thereby; or else, of a Chappel of Jup. Viminis. This also men called Figulensis, of the potters works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agnes and Nomentana.

Intergeres standeth in the Plain Viminalis, between the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinius his mires and banks, among which it was built. Tiburina stood between Esquilina and Nomentana, so as it was 12 Stadia distant from Esquilina, upon the plain of Esquilina in the very place where the conduit is of the Mary water.

Esquilina took that name of the hill Esquilina, the same in ancient time was called Taurina, of a bulls head there found: for many a day after was the said bulls head seen painted in the inner front of the said gate. At this day, S. Lawrence gate.

Navia drew the name of certain groves or woods near adjoining. In times past Laticana, and now Major. An arch there was so called and erected in the same place by the old Romans.

Calimontana, standing from Navia 8 Stadia, seemeth by a finity of name to be so called of the hill Caelus, in the edge whereof it standeth: and Afinaria it was called, of the Asses which were wont to be sent out to Naples, by that gate. At this time they call it S. Johns gate.

Gabinia, built close to the mount Caelus. Southeast: which seemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the City Gabii, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Mureddum, of measuring and is situate from Calimontana as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewise from Gabinia, seated not far from the Church of S. John Baptist: so called, for that men go forth out into Latum.

Capena is so named of the Capenas, a Latine nation, against which it lyeth. This also is called still Camana, of a grove and Chappel of the Mules, built just before the same gate. Appia likewise, of the high-way Appia; which Appius the Censor paved, and so it bare his name. They call it also also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with state. Of some it is named Pontialis, for the plenty of springs there. At this day S. Sebastians gate.

Tergemina took that name of an old gate so called, at which the 3 twins Horatii went forth against their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be seen; near the Salutina.

Hofstensis, was in ancient daies so called, for that it led to the City Hofstia: now S. Pauls gate: situate it is from Capena well-near 8 Stadia.

Portuensis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Stadium of the said river: so called, for that it leadeth to the haven of Hofstia. Now a daies men call it, Porta ripa, i. The bank gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Janiculum: distant from the former almost 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Aelia, was built by Aelius Hadrianus, of whom it took that name.

Septimiana, bare the name of Septimius the Emperor: and because it standeth under Janiculum, is at this day called, Subus Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontinalis, because out of the mount called Anrens, there issue fountains: for to the said hill this gate standeth close. From it to Aurelia are 5 Stadia; and to the river Tyber 7 juga or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome, and their names. The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of these are decayed and gone; others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

NOW is it time, and the course of the story doth require, that leaving the towns and walls, we enter into the City, and shew the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot of the City, were built by men in old time. First therefore, begin we will at the worthiest earthly habitation of all their Gods; to wit, the Capitol.

The second Book.

CHAP. I.

The sundry names of the Capitol.

THE Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnus, either of a City named Saturnia, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome standeth: or because Saturnus in times past dwelt in that hill: or else (as some think) for that the mount it self had Saturnus for the tutelal God and Protector thereof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeia, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Last of all, Tarquinius Priscus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a mans head; whereupon they called it Capitulum. And answered, That this Castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Castle and the Capitol. The Castle they built Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place: but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended,

CHAP. II.

Who first laid the foundation of the Capitol: who finished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom rectified.

IN the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, so soon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus finished the building, of 4 square stone: and defraided the charges thereof out of the pillage of the Consul, dedicated the said Capitol to Jupiter. It stood upright and found for the space of 415 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Consulship of Scipio and Narbo) it was consumed with fire. Sylla re-edified it, and Q. Caecilius consecrated it: and so it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a second time burnt, at what time it stood with the doors shut, undefended, and not rifled. Vespasian built it again, and in his life, a third time it was destroyed in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disbursed therein above 12000 talents. Of the Capitol turrets and pinnacles, the statues and images smitten with thunder-bolts and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The Temple of Jup. Feretrius, of Jup. Opt. Max. of Juno, and Minerva's.

THE Capitol, Cicero calleth The house and habitation of the gods, because it contained the chappels, statues, and images in manner of all the gods: but the first of all other in Rome was this that of Jupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the war against the Senones, after which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill. But Jupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as some would have it; for that Jupiter assisted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or else, because the Romans used in making of peace, to swear by his scepter and the flint. The roof of this Church fallen down for very age and through neglect of the Romans, Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Aeneas Silvius.

But the temple of Jup. Opt. Max. of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitolium; and Targ. Priscus vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of silver; but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unfinished to be accomplished by the Romans. Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tiberis, as hath been shewed before. For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple, read Dionysius and sundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it self. Upon the top or lantern thereof, stood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tiberis. It had within it besides, a sanctuary or secret chapel, which no Lay person might enter into. Within the said cell or chapel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them the Gauls consecrated to Jup. Opt. Maximus; the other the Carthaginians sent to Rome in the honor of Jupiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnites. Moreover, in the said temple were other three chapels, to wit, one of J. p. Opt. Max. in the midst; a second of Minerva on the right hand; and a third of Juno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was set down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail near unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This so rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place wheras it stood, is prophane; howbeit there remain yet to be seen, some tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken peccemeal.

CHAP. IV.

The Temples of Saturn, Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Custos, of Fortune, of Vejovis Mercy, Juno Moneta, and of Janus. The sepulchre of Orestes, the common Treasury, the house of Manlius, and chapel of Carmenta.

Since that we have described the temple of Jupiter K. of the Gods, in what place it was situate, and by whom built; meet it is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houses in the capitol: and first of Saturn, Jupiter's father.

Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as some think. There be that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules; others again say, that Tatius reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places and at several times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones also of Orestes brought from Aricta were bestowed); the other in that very place, where now standeth the chapel of S. Saviour: where yet at this day there is a turret to be seen, which they call the Tower in Æranum: for there first was the common treasure house of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Caius Lutatius, there stood Janus with four faces signifying the four times of the year: of whom the first month January took name.

The temple of Jupiter Tonans Augustus Cæsar first built, on the capitoline cliff or side of the hill, South-east: upon this occasion: It happened, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning slightly glanced thereupon, and killed the servant that he guide: and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honor of Thundering Jupiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Vejovis, stood between the cattle and the capitol, in that part where now the chapels are to be seen of conservators. In old time they called this Idol-devil, Vejovis, because he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they sacrificed a fine goat: because he held arrows in his hand, most men thought he was Apollo.

Ajstum, that is to say, the temple of Mercy stood likewise upon the capitol hill, near a shadowy grove, in the very valley amid the capitol, and the cattle. Called it is the temple Intermontium, between two okerows. This, Romulus erected; that what offender soever thither fled, he should be privileged as in a sanctuary. But Tiberius afterwards, supposing that this place ministered occasion of mischief, deprived it of that liberty. This Ajstum, by report, the posterity of Hercules first erected.

The temple (as also the mint-house) of Juno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where sometime stood the house of M. Manlius. This chapel, some report that L. Evius vowed; others, that L. Cicereius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Juno called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Juno, admonishing them of the future overthrow by the Senones. In this place now standeth a Senators house of Rome.

The

The temple of Janus keeper of the Capitoline cattle, stood in that place, whereat that day is the goal and prison for malefactors and felons, toward the Southwest, over-against the Forum Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Romulus, and Tatius devised to have two faces presenting thereby the two nations. Others would have him to be portrayed a faced, with a cunning and providence: for he was the first that invented the roial crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; brazen coin and many other things. Janus took that name ab unda, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things else. For which cause he also named Vertumnus; in old time they believed there was but one Janus; but posterity in later age, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter Custos, Domitian (after he was invested in the empire) built, and placed his own image in the lap and bosome of that god. It stood where at this day the Salana or Isleptis arc, near to the temple of Janus.

CHAP. V.

The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

Among those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the first was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formless stone. Unto him Tatius first vowed a temple; and some say, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily ancient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause: when Tarquinius Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he consulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They shewed unto him the mount Tapirus, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whose chapels there, were consecrated and bestowed. These therefore were by certain sacrifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way to Jupiter, and to be translated into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yielded their places up to Jupiter as their K, only Terminus refused to be displaced: and for maiden there still. When he had finished the temple and fore-part of the roof which regarded the said stone, was left naked and open for that god, as who never ought nor could be enclosed, the augurs therefore being sought unto and demanded, For what reason Terminus alone abode still with Jupiter, when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby signified, that together with religion, their empire also was eternal. To this god they sacrificed not but in open air and publicly abroad, as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Augustine witnesseth, that Mars also and Joveinus together with Terminus would not agree to give place to Jupiter: for that the dominion of Rome should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Erycina, Artinus and Æ. Fab. Mars, being Dnumvirs, dedicated chapels upon the Capitol, severed sundry by one vault or altar.

To queen Juno, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple. To Ops, Tatius the K, consecrated a temple; for that she is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The same Ops is called Mars, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blasted with fire from heaven, as Levy testifieth.

Mars revenger, Augustus Cæsar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturninus.

To Faith, on the same hill, Artinus Collatinus dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they built temples: and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Præmigenia and Obsequens, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus bald they also set up a temple in the Capitol, in memoriam and everl stiaj praise of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engines, that during the Gauls war, were devised and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponsor, and Sp. Posthumus dedicated it. Likewise to Jupiter. After the old Romans consecrated a temple in the Capitol.

CHAP. VI.

Of the statues which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

Of statues in old time were sundry sorts, and the same made of divers matter: some of marble, some of brass, some of silver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers causes, and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had deserved well of the common-weal, the usual manner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a statue in his temple, after he had vanquished the Samnites, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Latiarius his image. Pliny maketh mention, that this statue was smitten with lightning. He also set up another to Minerva.

The old Romans set up in the temple of Jup. Opt. Max. statues to Victory and Faith, to either of them one.

For

For Numerius was an image erected in the Capitol, for that this goddess punished proud and faithless persons. She is named also Rhemus a village in Attica, where she was worshipped; Adraftus, who was the first that built a temple in the honor of her. Ugo Horatius, for his notable and famous act; they erected many statues in the Capitol and namely Pub. Sulpicius and Pub. Sempertus one; and Ca. Fabius Max. another, which he brought from the Tarentines by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good fortune (the workmanship both of Praxiteles) were within the Capitol.

The image of Apollon with a diadem, and his Colossus thirty cubits high, in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents. Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Pontus, into the Capitol.

An image there was of Janus likewise in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 300 and in his left of sixty five, to signify the days of the year.

Two golden statues of Castor and Pollux, were by the Emperor Claudius of famous memory, dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nilus and Tygris, half naked, were set up in the forefront of the temple of Conversators: the one carry upon the shoulders, Sphinx; the other a Tygre; two wild beasts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopia, which signifieth plenty.

The personage of Heracles portrayed naked, of brasse and double girth, without beard holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Hesperides, was found near the Greek school and the beast market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraits also of the Partians and Dacian triumphs, enclosed within walls which were taken out of the church now called S. Martini.

CHAP. VII.

Statues of famous and noble men set up in the Capitol.

The statues they erected in the Capitol, a statue wearing a soldiers cassock and slippers or pattens in regard of his victory over Antiochus, for an everlasting memorial of his worthy deeds.

To Sylla there was also a statue erected in the Capitol, in habit of a footman.

For Amphilas Lepidus, when he was but a boy, the people of Rome set up a statue, because he had in a battle vanquished the enemy, and saved a Citizen.

The like honour to the rest they did to Mithridates, for that he had preserved out of the temple of Pallas, being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image to Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, in recompence of a benefit of hers for the great dearth of corn, she served the people at 3 farthings a Modius. The same they did to Trebia the Adile.

Fabius Maximus made for himself a cast or molten image, and erected it just by that of Horatius.

Unto Brutus, for delivering Rome from the tyranny of Tarquinus, the Romans erected his image in the midst of the KK. statues.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unless it were of molten silver of gold, and of a certain weight.

The emperor Commodus took off the head from the colossus of Nero, & set upon it his own statue which he had in the Capitol. This Colossus is to be seen broken as it was, in the house of Conversators.

In the said houses of Conversators, is extant yet the brasse portraiture of a she-wolf, at whose teats, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seen how they hang sucking.

The image of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitol, resembling two youths; the one, standing upon the feet in servile habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepherd or herdsman, bending forwards with the body, plucking a thorn out of the sole of his foot, which raked and fettered withal.

An infinite number of statues were in the Capitol, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romans robbed the churches of foreign nations, for to enrich and adorn their own.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitol cliff, Tarpeia rock, the fons of Carmentis, and the gate Stercoraria.

In old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol, Clivus Capitolinus: but where that place was in times past, sundry opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Aventine, where now standeth S. Gregorius Church in Velabrum: others between the temples of Saturnus and Conservators, near to the arch of Severus, and at the stairs and landings, called Senatus Stabula. Now the arch of Severus was raised at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Romanum: unto which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was near unto the Roman Forum: which by the Censors was paved with flint, a whole league: set up a gallerie from the Chappell of Saturn unto the Capitol Temple close to the Senaculum.

Senaculum and the Curia over it. Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies upon the Capitol, and thereupon arose many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In the place of the feast Floralis was in old time celebrated, whereof some tokens remain at this day to be seen. In it stood Milos boulev, which was full of shields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

That place was called Tarpeia rock which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past felonious malefactors found guilty, were pitched down head-long, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Carmentis fons, regardeth Tiberis, just over-against the Senators bridge.

The Dining-gate called Stercoraria, stood upon the Capitol cliff afore said; thither was thrown out all the filth rid out of the temple of Vesta, to be carried away and soon after to be cast into the Tiberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of the brasse columns or pillars, and of the silver Goose.

In the Capitol there were two sorts of tables; the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the siege and assault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were so devious of praise and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own statues erected in the Capitol, unless their acts were described also and depicted in tables set up in public place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewise to posterity. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Romulus, Numa, and the other KK. Likewise the statues of the later lawgivers: the public acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the sacred rites and divine service, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in brasse tables: of which, some at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and careless negligence are lost and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed, that in so tedious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars likewise of brasse, were by Domitian set up in the Capitol; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Egypt, caused (of many brasse beak heads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rome. Sylla likewise took out of Tiberius temple in Asiens, certain brasse pillars, brought them to Rome, & there consecrated them to Jupiter in the Capitol.

The Portraiture of a goose in silver, was set up within the Cattle by the Romans for perpetual memory, because a goose by gigning gave warning of the enemies coming, to the warders of the cattle, and thereby saved the Capitol. For which cause geese a long time after, were fed & kept in Rome at the Cities charges. There are besides many other antiquities within the Capitol, cut in tables of brasse and marble both, and namely, Epitaphs, which here for brevities sake are left out.

CHAP. X.

Of certain edifices and buildings upon the Capitol hill, and of other things in general.

Now that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columns, worth the noting something by the way would be laid in the place, as touching the ancient houses there. The court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built the Capitol, and covered it with reed. Into this place the King-sacrificer was wont to assemble the Senat and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the daies of solemn game, plays, and sacrifices.

Nor far from the said Curia, was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost the same place stood the stately porch or gallery of Metellus and Constantinus. This Library also called Majorum, built artificially upon marbles pillars and besides the publick courtyard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitol, from whence they gathered Verecunda, or sacred herbs, to make garlands for the facials heralds and the Paterfamilias: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The flint stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they swore by Jupiter, pronouncing these words, If I made default with my knowledge, then let Dielpiter cast me out of all that I have (saying the City and the castle) as I hurt from me this stone.

The Capitol had certain vaults like cellitens, into which were thrown all things over-worn, or so old that they were good for nothing. The six flocks drawing in one team, were there to be seen, which Cneus Cornelius set up, the twelve gilded shields likewise, made of that many wherein the Edils condemned and fined the corn-mongers that hoarded and kept in their corn. The shield also Marcius, set out with the image of Asdrubal, and the column garnished with ship beak-heads of brasse, wherewith Livy speaketh, were here to be seen. Within the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus there was a short cloak or mantle and purple wollen, to which, of other purple garments were laid, they showed the colour of asses in regard of the excellent bright glows and lustre that it carried. A present this was (by report) given to Aurelianus by a Persian KK. who had it from the farthest Indians. The linell, cheeks and fill of the Capitol dore, were made all of brasse. The brasse tiles likewise upon the roof, Q. Calpurnius gilded over the place where Numa took his auguries.

Moreover, between M. Scavrus his house and Caicini, there was but a small step over. Cicero's house purchased of Crassus, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the Church of Jup. Statoris, near the Palatium. Pliny testifieth, how the houses of Crassus the Orator, and Phrybini, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One Captain Vasus likewise had an house in the Palatium, in the former chapter.

A. O. Tiburtius, whereof we have written in the former chapter. Augustus (born in the region about Palatium, in a place called Capitulum, the three heads; and where after his death, they erected a chapel unto him) dwelt first near the Roman Forum, above the round stairs called Scala annularis, in the house sometime of Calvus the Orator. Afterwards, he built the stately Palatine at his own charges and gave it to the City, and himself dwelt on the Patine hill in the small house of Horatius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salus, built in the mount Palatine, chanced to be burnt; and in the ashes thereof, the staff of Romulus called Lutius was found, without any hurt.

Publius dwelt in an house standing over the Forum, which was called Suburbia. That the dwelling house of Tarquinius Priscus was near unto the Temple of Jup. Statoris, may soon be proved out of Livy.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Velia; the statues in Palatine, and other things in general.

The pitch of the hill called Summa Velia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the South-east, whereas now is the Temple of Mary the new. Called Velit it was, because in old time before the device of shearing sheep, the shepherds were there wont to pluck the wool from the sheeps back.

Augustus set up a Library of Latine and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brasses of that huge colossus of Tulcan Apollo. He adjoynd thereto a porch or gallery, which they called Palatium.

In it was erected by the Senat, a statue unto Numerius the Emperor; and a singular diatory. In the same porch, the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Varro, while he lived.

The Augustorinus, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Apollus Palatinus likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium, Latona in the same was placed.

The Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus. Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his spear, was in the Palatium. For he, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Aventinus, lanced his spear from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and suddenly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed garlands.

The Palatine bairns, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Orations for Roscius, were in the same Velitum; and of them there remain yet some tokens; above the Circus maximus, not far from the Inclyard of Fedra.

In the same mountain also there was a place called Sicilia, and Iupiters parlor. The most beautiful streets called Atrium, paved with Lacedæmonian and Porphyr stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Paludus and Fortuna respectively, were to be seen in Palatine, and there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palatium.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium; and the old gate of the very Palatium is false.

How great a compals the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most precious pillars there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built to great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yieldeth grafs and food, for sheep caples and goats. So as it seemeth it may be called Palatium of the bleating that feeds make, rather than Palatium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Atrium, built in old time and hallowed by Angury: in it the Senat sate in council, because they might not assemble in any place uninaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rams were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was near the Roftra, over-against S. Laurence Church in Miranda. Some would have this to be called the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

The Temples of Janus, Augustus, and Fauftina.

After the description of the Temples and edifices of Palatium the third part of the city, now followeth a fourth: namely, the Roman Forum. Therein is the most stately Temple of Janus, (for me thinks we do well to begin at Janus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gates. For Janus himself, who was therein worshipped, had four faces: and from Faliscia a city in Tuscan forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transitorium. His Temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked to over-against the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Destinies. Other Temples there were besides of Janus, and namely, in the Capitol near the theatre of Marcellus, with two fronts all of brals, and had two bralen dore, which in time of peace were shut and against war, were let open.

The temple of Augustus was builded in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but left imperfect. Calpurnia finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joynd the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Fauftina. Hadrianus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the bralen image of a bull standeth) for her sake that he might be honoured as a goddess. The same, his son Antoninus Heliogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himself, or Ishtar Syrus, or else the Sun. At this day it is the church of S. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.

The Temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Roftra.

No man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollux was sometime in the Roman Forum before the Roftra, near to that above said of Fauftina. This sacred house A. Posthumus the Dictator dedicated: and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dionitian spoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat used to sit in council, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also he set up the portraiture and resemblance of Flora, a picture of singular beauty. A table besides, which contains the records and monuments, touching the free burgeoisie granted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked up, as witnesseth Cicero.

There was a temple or consecrate place called Roftra, at the foot of the hill Palatine, over-against that before named of Castor and Pollux: whereas now is the little chapel of S. Mary de Inferno. From these Roftra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.

The Temple of Cæsar, Venus Genitrix, and Mars revenger: and the court of Venus.

Cæsar of famous memory had a temple near his own Forum, at the broad street called Sacra, behind the temple of Fauftina. In it were set up as Saints, Victory and Castor. In the same Cæsar Forum, there stood a chapel of Venus Genitrix, behind the said temple of Fauftina. This, Cæsar vowed in the Pharsalian war, and dedicated it. After victory in the war against Pompey, Cæsar enclosed the temple of the said Venus, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus Cæsar in the battel of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron pots dedicated to Mars: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martina.

CHAP. XI.

The Temples of Volcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacina.

The temple of Volcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottom of the Palatine hill: but Tatius dedicated the temple of Volcan, as also of the Sun and Moon, of Saturn, Rhea, Vesta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of Volcan there was dedicated unto Volcan, the bralen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Coctus there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people in this time.

In the day belonging to Volcan temple, Fulvius, the son of a Libertine or enfranchised citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of Ulfers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine. Opposite the Consul Consul afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny testifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies, Livia Drusilla in her open gallery, erected a chapel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her; which afterwards Tiberius dedicated.

In that place where Drusilla first founded the said chapel of Concord, Vespasian afterwards with wonderful celerity and speed, (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claudian. A large building this was, and four square, set out with most stately and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richest. In it Vespasian betowed the holy vessels and precious ornaments of the Temple in Hierusalem, which T had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Ganymedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once suddenly was consumed whole: and never was it known to this day how this fire came: unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earthquake which hapned the same hour, the stones rubbed together and struck fire.

An altar of Peace was by Augustus first reared; but in what place, the posterity knoweth not. The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Between the Temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cosmes and Damian. Some think it was the Temple of Romulus and Remus, the same that Caraculus the Consul, after he had subdued the Samnites, dedicated, and of the infinit mass of spoils adorned it.

That the Temple of Venus Cloacina stood near the broad street Sacra, Ovid testifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and Tatin consecrated it. And because it was not known whose resemblance it was, it took the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the house of Cassius, and the Temery.

Where the Temple of Tellus stood, some say it is uncertain: others think it was not far from the Elquilæ, near the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Vincula, where now standeth the Temple of Pantheon. Semperpronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battail with his enemy, at Asculum the head Town of the Picenians, the earth quaked: and because he would pacify the goddess Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. Built it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Cassius (who fought to be a King) was overthrowen. Near unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Altory; where of Cicero also maketh mention in a certain place. Within the said compass, C. Junius Bibaculus the Consul, vowed a chapel to the goddess Salus, in the time of the Samnites war. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

L. Volturnus an Edile, caused the Temple of Vittoria near the Roman Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Esculapius, were near the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury also was in the Forum.

The Temples likewise of Ips and Serapia were in the Burse called Epigraphium. And some think, that these were the Chapells of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatin.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

Thus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which seemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speak of those things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and first begin we will with that excellent Prince Trajanus.

Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apollodorus, between the Forum of Peace, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also at the commandment of Trajanus Metodius and Gymnasium. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of brass, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses, and military ensigns all gilt. Now were these foresaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deserved well of the common-weal, or otherwise of some notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large chapiers, yielded so great admiration to the beholders, that they seemed rather the works of giants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajan horse in like manner stood in the midst, bearing upon high columns.

In a coin also there is found the image of Trajan, with this inscription: S. P. Q. R. OPTIMO PRIN-Principi, The Senat and the people of Rome to the best Prince. But heretofore Lampridius writeth much.

Helikewise is reported to have adorned the palace, made of sundry marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the midst of the Forum, there stood the column of Trajan, built with winding stairs. This had round about it the summary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chased most cunningly, but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light unto them: that shall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Entropius writeth) 140. In the himself never saw: for whiles he warred against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in a flux of blood, his dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors he alone (as Entropius writeth) was interred within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills: but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raise sepulchres in every place, it hapned that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodies instead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.

The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

Next to our sight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Church of S. Hadrian. In the midst of it there stood a Column of brass of an huge bigness: covered with plate of beaten copper, and hath within it light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers statues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva. This was afterwards called Forum Trajanum, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet some part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum: for being consumed by fire, yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part also of the Palace of Nerva, built of 4 square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blas, are yet seen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Adrian.

CHAP. XV.

The Roman Forum, the Comitium, the prison Tullianum, and the Image of Marforius.

The Roman Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitol, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in dec. But at the first the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof above named, it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Augustus Caesar enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatium and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitol hill, South-east ward, Aulus Marius built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in. After him K. Tullius adjoynd to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big stones, with narrow long holes for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, ugly for darkness, and loathsome by reason of a strong and stinking scent. This whole prison was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Carcer it was called in Latine, & coercendo: because it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

Just before this prison there lieth a huge marble idol which they call Marforius. Some think it was the image of the bakers god others, of Jupiter, furnished Panavius of the tumours that bear outlike to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past when they were besieged by the Gauls in the Capitol, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romans could possibly be tamed with hunger, brake up the siege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetuall memorial of this benefit, erected an altar and a statue to Jupiter Pifus.

This image is thought to be the resemblance of the river Rheine in Germany, because it is upon a rock. But why it should be called Marforius, I know not unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretary of the people of Rome; the arch of Septimius; the Temple of Saturn, Of the Treasury, and the mint-house where they coined money.

Behind the image of Marforius over against the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martin: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraven in marble, was sometime the place called the Secretary of the people of Rome.

Right against the said Church of S. Martin at the bottom of the rock Tarpia, standeth the arch of Septimius, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and sea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of Saturn, now, S. Hadrian's Church. The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Lartius for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinius: albeit more likely it is that Lartius dedicated it. Livy writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M. Minutius were Coli, Namantius Plancus rededified it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitol into this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturn's Temple, there be divers opinions. Some say, because in Saturn's daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miser nor lowd person laid wait for his neighbour; but all things were administered with righteousness, faith, and love. Cyprian allegeth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the publicke ordinances. Also the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: also the ancient writings and records of the old Ævium and the City debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensignes of war. Over and besides, whatsoever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Lastly, whatsoever was expedient and profitable for the Common-weal to be received, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Censors likewise were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the Church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the Temple of Cæsar and Pollux, stood in old time the work-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.

The golden Militarium the bridge of Caligula, the Rostra and the Curia.

Militarium aureum stood in times past at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of Saturn, near to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, so called, wherein all the high-waies of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridge of marble through the Roman Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitol. A more stately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City: for the bridge was sustained with fourcore mighty pillars of most white marble: whereof at this day three are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridge. In the midst of the Forum, over-against S. Hadrian's Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the resemblance of Rhene, a river in Germany; for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province. And this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Antiat ships; a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Rostra, that therein the acts of the Senat should be made. Now of this Rostra there were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before said, and the old, near the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were laws published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same manner was also to erect the Statues of most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Rostra, upon a lion of stone was the portraiture let for Ensilulus the fosterfather of Romulus and Remus. For he, whiles he was detestous to part the fray between Romulus & Remus the founders of the City, was there slain, where, afterwards they erected unto him his statue. Behind the Rostra was the sepulchre also of Romulus. Moreover, before the Rostra stood the statue of Hercules clad in a coat after the Eleians habit, with a grime and stern countenance. Three fables also of Sibylla in the same place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to set up the heads of those that were put to death, there to be seen.

Two Curia or Councill-houses at Rome there were: one near the Forum, fast by the Temple of Peace, named Hofilia; the other in the mount Colinus, whereof we will speak hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Lake Curvius, the great sink for town ditch, and the Doliola.

The lake Curvius was in the midst of the Rom. Forum, near Domitian's his horse. This lake took that name of M. Curvius, who to save the Common-weal, willingly of his own accord cast himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman Forum. Some would have it so called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his own company.

The vault or sink called Clauca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Tarquin: for by reason that the hills were digged under, and the City stood so low upon arches, received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of Jup. Stator, divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopp'd up, the third runneth with most clear water by the Lake Curvius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Veldrum, and from thence in a sink made of four-square stone, it ditcheth it self into Tyber. In old time there there were many such vaults, and those for publicke use. But after the City was won by the Gauls & burnt, whiles every man made haste to rebuild his house, where he could meet first with a convenient place; they took no heed to the streets; as they were before: so as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the sinks which in times past went under the streets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under private mens houses, whereby it came to pass, that each house almost at this day hath a sink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, whose epitome or abridgement we write, hath not divided the regions of the City, agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which he setteth down, might be sooner understood, and better remembered, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it standeth and when he sheweth in what part of the city any place in times past was, he declareth them in those coasts which at this day are known to the inhabitants. But as at first these sinks were common (as I have said) so there were appointed publicke officers to look unto them.

Near the foresaid great sink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Doliola. This place was reputed to holy, that a man might not spit thereupon. In it were supposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Nama. And yet, there be that think verily the allies of the French Senones were there befowled.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genetrix, The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium, and Roman Forum, Cæsar's statue and pillar.

VHere the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended, we have shewed before, in the fiftenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plutarch saith, for that Romulus and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senat and people of Rome assembled, wherein they would decree any thing for the good of the C. W. and namely, when Consuls, Tribunes Consul, and such Magistrates were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit assemblies were summoned, yet they were impeached holding for them, fearing some tempestuous weather toward. Long time after, when Amulius came into Italy, they let a roof over it: and afterwards Cæsar repaired it again. In this Comitium the plaies were many times exhibited. In the same (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many lewd and outrageous acts were committed in the assemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comitium stood the statue of Cæsar: which being afterwards stricken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcanus. In the cantons and angles of the Comitium, were the statues likewise of Patagonus and Alabandus. Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the curia stood the Image of Ascanius together with his wheedle and razor.

The Image resembling the Mother goddess, was set up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddess, were of this opinion that the stone whereof she was made, could not possibly be consumed with fire: which they guessed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made in the night especially at her Image yet it took no hurt thereby: and therefore gave they out, that there was such virtue herein as I have said. And from thence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worship her, and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genetrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple stood the statue of Cæsar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like manner a Column of Cæsar made of Numidian marble, so foot high there remained. Before the Temple of Cæsar there was the statue of Q. Marcius in horsemans habit: of Trenellius clad in a side gown; of M. Atticus covered with a veil.

CHAP. XX.

The column called Maxima: the pillar Horatia: the losses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian, The Temple and Court-yard of the said Cæsar.

IN that part of the Forum was the Column Maxima, where stood the palace of Porcius. Called Maxima it was, of Maximian the Censor: for he (when as he held unto Cæsar his house, and when Placcus the other Censor gave order, that the palace aforesaid should there be built, reserved in the sale to much space for himself, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to jut forth, made of joists and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posterity might behold the sport of sword-fencers. And this privilege he obtained: whereupon, others also, as many as might be allowed, were as industrious, and built them columns in the Forum.

There stood a rock of stone in the Forum, whereupon the spoils of the three twins Curvius were hanged.

In like manner, the pillar called Horatia.

The houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum, Likewise the court and cloister of Minerva; and the shops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The dead corps of Caesar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple.
Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy,

CHAP. XXI.

Caesars Forum: the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

BESIDES the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap. of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Caesars Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There, was in that place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There, was the Temple of Venus Genetrix, about which, Caesar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and merchandise to be sold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and those most fair and beautiful) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood him in an hundred millions of Affes and above.

Caesar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Emilius the Colleague of G. Marcellus in his Consulship, to be his friend and to stand with him, Paulus having received this sum of money, built in the midst of the Forum near to the Temple of Caesar and Pollex, a most excellent and wonderful Palace, of Phrygian columns, which afterwards they named, Basilica Pauli.

A Library also the same Paulus created, near unto his own Basilica.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Caesars house.

THE Roman Forum, whose also of Julius Caesar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Augustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Caesar, but excellently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Caesar and Pollex, with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollin in Ivory; and besides these, other ensigns and ornaments of virtue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum, public justice was administered: and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in council, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with sovereign command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensigns and tokens of their victory. This Forum being by time decayed, Hadrian redified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner. Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously furnished by his niece Livia. And Augustus not able to abide this wastful superfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void plot and court-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonine & Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles well built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the Church of S. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The raster or beam, called Sotorium Tigillum: the street Cyprinus, Scelcratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

Sotorium Tigillum was a place allowed for the expiation and atoning of Horatius for killing his sister, set up near the street Carinae, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprinus is near to the cliff or rising of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vincula, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were afranchised and made free denizens, surnamed afterwards it was Scelcratus, upon the wicked and devilish act of Tullia, whereof Livy speaketh. Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patritius was so called, because of Patritii, who were by K. Tullus commanded there to dwell. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others: from whence as from the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus. After Antonius, the Church of S. Pancration was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIV.

Buſta Gallica, and Aequimelum;

Buſta Gallica, was a place in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day standeth the the Church of S. Andrew (in Buſta Gallica). Now they call it by an awk name, Portigallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre, Varro fetcheth the Buſta Gallica near the Aequimelum. As for Aequimelum, it was so called, because the house of Melina who fought to be K, was there laid level with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.

The street called Via Sacra: the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

THIS street beginneth at the old Curia, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Constantine. Varro suppoeth that it began at the Curia, and the chappel of Sternia. Whereby a man may gather that the Via Sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Caesar, and so directly up to the Cattle of the Capitoll. The name of Sacra it took for that the Augurs when they came from the Capitoll hill, went through it as they took their Augury: or because monthly, they went in procession with sacred requies along that way: or last of all in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made between Romulus and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Aeneas Martius in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lares.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Cladius. The arch Fabian likewise, near the Kings Palace, fast by the Basilica of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Censor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his arms, and other tokens of the victory engraven. Fast by it, Scribonius Labe erected a seat and Tribunal for the Praetor, named Pateal.

In the same street-way was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by Vespasian after he had won Hierusalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one side, and on the other, his triumphs and spoils: and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the Temple of Hierusalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Gracostasis; Senaculum; the Curia; the Palaces of Opimius and Porcius.

Gracostasis is a place on the right hand of the Rastras, as men go forth of the Comitium; where, the Embassadors of foreign nations being sent unto the Senat, used to stand and give audience until they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Opimius, and the Curia, stood near unto the Gracostasis. Above the Gracostasis was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord. Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet. In Greek it is named Tegyria.

Curia was in the Comitium, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required public care were there debated. There was a Curia also of Priests, where Church-matters were handled and treated of. Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pass, but in the place set out and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curia Hostilia, Pomptia, and Julia, being profane places before, were by inauguration consecrated Temples. In this Curia was the altar of Piculus; and upon the stairs of the said Curia stood the image of Vulturnus, made of fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Consulship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forum, under the Curia, which after his own name he called Portia Basilica.

The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. Mary the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joyned together in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Comitium toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Esquilia.

The fourth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Temple of Janus and Pietty: of the publick goal of Rom. Commons.

BEING that four parts of the City are described, the fifth enjoineth; which in Iudeth those places that comprehend Tyre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tarpeia on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore begin we will at the memorable places, which are next after the Theatre of Marcus, and so run through the plan and level plot of the City. And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Nanus built a Temple at the gate Carnementalis, (afterwards the chappel of S. Katharine) at the bottom of the Argiletum, close the greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and sumptuousness of the games: or else because in comparison of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminius, and the other called Antimus, i. e. the inmost, this was the biggest. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs; and one in breadth, so as it would well serve for two hundred and sixty thousand men to sit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it;

Consius is reported to be the god of Counsell, either for that he concealth mens counsels, or openeth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great shew-place covered over which betokeneth that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him consecrated. For they, at what time as they consulted about the ravishing of the Sabine maidens, fearing lest they should have been detected before the time, dedicated this altar to this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily, either by some injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued so for ever, as it ended it was altogether unknown where it stood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runnings, and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consualia. And those discourses and pastimes which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Priests belonging to that god.

In like manner Neptunus, surnamed the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Circus Max. which in the year of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. Anastasia at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for such marks and tokens were there to be seen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptunus, the games Circenses were by men in old time solemnized.

Alto Genius the guide and director of secret plots, they directed an altar in the great Cirque; Over and besides these, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penates; and a third to those gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things arise and have their beginning. These gods above said, the Romans called Genii, Penates, Prædites, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proserpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Max. which Pesthinnus when he warred against the Latines vowed, and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compass were the Temples of the sun, and of Flora. Moreover, a Temple there stood near this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Gurges the Consul, caused to be made of the money raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing false with their husbands.

Lucius dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place.

In like sort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max. In Plinius daies there was seen in the Circus Max. the image of Fortuna Seia.

CHAP. XIII.

The Naumachy of the great Cirque.

Naumachy is a place so called ὡς ναυὸς ταῖς ναύσι μάχιστο, i. e. for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were represented some shews of naval fight, for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the cirques only, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV.

The two Obelisks of the Circus Max.

The Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or brooch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might resemble a ray or sun-beam, it grew smaller and smaller in fashion of a steeple, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, such as testifie either the founder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise: Moreover, the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark to. Thus much saith he. Now they drew and portrayed therein sundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they referred and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Aegypt only, but also in other parts of the world, until such time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At the first one letter implied a whole word, and one word went for a whole sentence. But hereof ye shall find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Pliny witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Sinithes. Then they erected and consecrated consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams, as we said before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K. Mithres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and so for beautiful shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque afore said, called Maximus two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright aloft, 80 foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachi; it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, gyre: but when he would have set it up on end it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewn out of the quarry by King Samsufraces, in whole reign Pythagoras was in Aegypt.

CHAP. XV.

The arch of Sertinius in the Cirque. The place of the Tuberoes in the Cirque. The stew, the house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna.

Sertinius having made conquest of Spain, brought great store of money into the City chamber: And of the spoils taken from enemies, he reared two arches: the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus. Upon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Helii was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was to be great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their singular prowess all the worthy places and Theatres, to behold all fights and matters of activity.

About the Circus Maximus stood the stews and brothel-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty packs kept, in, as made profession of whoredom. But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompeius was near the Circus Max. & therein was the statue of Hercules erected. The fountain or well of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the Vil. Arum near the common sink or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI.

The Sepulchrum of Severus.

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the last part of the City, namely, the mount Calvus, but because we meet with the Sepulchrum of Severus, & the arch of Constantine (better welcome to Calvus) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoynted out or terrace raised from the plain ground a square, compassed about with eleven articles, galleries: and in this order they are disposed that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and steeper the cabins. In the top thereof four walls arise, containing within them certain hollow places like Jui. Capitolinus nameth this mount Sepodium, for the Greeks call places much frequented, where seven lots or furlongs. For in every corner thereof the columns meet together in the head with masonry of brañones. Other beams there be are besides, reaching inward from them to the mount itself, so as every such course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Sepodia we quity, not far from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be seen no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remain still, over against S. Gregories Church 3 Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious work; for the beauty and stateliness of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himself. That which now is left thereof leaveth out so far, as it seemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII.

The triumphant arch of Constantine the Emperor.

These triumphant arches were erected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces or conquered Irrainations & obtained brave & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triump, and thereupon they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these arches for the perpetual and everlasting memoriall of acts achieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places where the war was performed: the resemblances of Fabrics and ranged battels, if the service was on land; and of ships, if it were at sea. Howbeit, until the time of the Emperors, no man raised any arches, and in Plinius daies they began first to be built: so as that of Titus is of all others most ancient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in process of time following, many of these arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rest, at the corner of the mount Palatine, near the Theatre, beautified with triumphall ornaments, and and remaineth at this day in a manner found and whole without any hurt. This arch Constantine erected for himself upon the victory which he obtained over Maxentius at the bridge Milvianum.

CHAP. XVIII.

Caelius the mount, and Caeliolus.

The mount Caelius in old time was named Quercetulanus, for the number of oaks there growing; but afterwards it was so called of one Caelius Vibenna, a Duke of the Tuscan nation, unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuscan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thufca. But such as were without suspicion, kept the hill Caelianus or Caeliolus, i.e. the little Caelius; a place where sometime the goddess Diana was worshipped: and at this day there standeth the Church consecrated to S. Eusebia the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Augustus.

CHAP. XIX.

The Temples of Faunus, Venus, and Cupid; the Campi Hostilia: the forrain camp: the house of the Laterans: the Palace of Constantine and Caesarianus: the horseman statue of L. Verinus.

Upon the ridge or side of the mount Caelius there standeth a round Church, now patronized by S. Stephen, but hallowed and consecrated in times past to Faunus. Faunus he was called, and quiritis, for that he foretold things to come by voice and not by signs. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the Church stands of S. Mary Dominick. In the hill Caelius stood sometimes the Temples of Venus and Cupid, not far from the gate Nevia, where now is the Church of the holy Croix in Hierusalem.

The Court Hostilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Hostilius first dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

A place there was in the mount Caelius called Castra Peregrina, toward the Northeast and the Esquiae, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

The house of the Laterans also was built upon the same mount, at the Palace or stately Hall of the Laterans.

The Palace of Flavius Constantinus, near the house of the Laterans, stood between the gates Capitoline and Galusca.

The Palace of Caesarianus was built at the gate Nevia, and the Church of S. Holy-croix in Hierusalem.

In the street called Lateranensis stood the statue on horseback of L. Verinus. Some say it was made for M. Aurelius Antoninus, others, for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XX.

Of the Amphitheatres, and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

Now it followeth to speak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, it would be briefly shewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum cometh, as ἀμφὶ & θέατρον, i.e. of looking round about: for two prospects joyed in one, make the form of an hemisphere or half circle. Some think that Titus devised the Amphitheatre first, but some know and prove that C. Caesar built the first that ever was in Mars field: but by the authority of Strabo it is proved, that Statilius reared one Amphitheatre before Titus. In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beasts. Condemned persons likewise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearful sight to behold; for thither were those prisoners brought by the Editors, within that enclosure to wrestle and maintain conflict with wild beasts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in these Amphitheatres shews of sword-fencers at the sharp foil and death, to the end, that the soldiers should be acquainted with fights, and learn not to be afraid of weapons of wounds, nor of bloodshed, nor to draw back and avoid the peril of war to come for the novelty and strangeness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatre is yet to be seen near the walls at S. Crocifera Church in Hierusalem. And at the same time he built it, when Augustus Caesar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautify and adorn the City.

CHAP. XXI.

The water conduits why they were devised, by what means waters were conveyed into the City, to what purposes by whom first, and how many.

The City of Rome in the beginning, as hath been said in the first book, was but narrow of compass and contained within small bounds: and the people for commodity and store of water, settled upon the river Tyber. But as the city dayly more and more increased, necessary it was that some should build them houses and habitation in one place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon distressed it was for want of water, which was to be fetched so far off, and that away the silt, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noisome air which was infected with their vomit) the Emperor Nero took to himself the remedy of this mischief, and others after him, by his example and device by the wise and subtle invention of men, conduits pipes, to bring water in by arched work, when by digging certain hills or vaults the water was carried level above ground, being water into the city by secret underways through pipes, fountains, and rocks. By which means it came to pass, that in the city every where, such store there was of water, that each house almost had a well in it, but especially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the side thereof, in the street Parriensis, Sabura, the Lamine way, the Aventine, the Jews street, and in many other places: so as in this our age full it is of such water-works under the ground. Now were these waters conveyed from divers places, and some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches were higher or lower than others: in the beginning and all the former times, there were (by report) five the water pipes Tapula into the fourth: then Martin, and after it old Anio, the level or current whereof, Virgo followeth and Appia, and the lowest of all others, Alfentia, which serves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber and other low places built upon the plain. These waters were first brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain measure distributed by the conduit officers, and so ran into places appointed. Now that great conduit-head was called Castellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards divideth it out into divers levels or above ground certain cisterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve certain wardens and keepers, and a set number of labourers and workmen to see thereto. Finally, a head, or derived and conveyed water to other places than the laws or public ordinances, or the Clandius (by report) was the first man that brought water into the city by arched work. But of the ancient, the instruments, measures, and weights thereof belonging, read Frontinus, who of these things hath written truly and at large. Also have recourse to Sex. Rufinus, who of the same argument hath made a good treatise. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appia, old Anio, Martin, Tapula, Julia, Virgo, Alfentia, called also Agusta, Clandius, and new Anio. Rufinus reckoneth ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

CHAP. XXII.

The conduits or conveyance of Aqua Claudia.

Agrippa began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died. Claudius the Emperor of famous memory, took them in hand again, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the fountains or springs called Caracalla and Curvus, was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia: the other, for difference sake of the two conduits of Anio he called his own, or the new Anio: and distinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Nevia, along the side of the mount Caelius into the Aventine. A part also thereof Caracalla derived into the Capitol hill.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of those things which now in mount Caelius are not known where they stood.

Romulus the Consul having expelled Turquinius, built a Temple to the goddess Carna in mount Caelius, to which goddess also, upon the accomplishment of his prayer and vows, he offered sacrifices. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vital members of the body, and upon her altars, and presented oblations.

Agrippina likewise began to build a Temple to Claudius Caesar, which after her death Poppaea finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the very foundation: this also was erected in the same hill, Mammura Formiana, Master of Caesar Carpenters in France was the first Roman that adorned and set out his house which he had in Caelius hill with marble rough-cast. Moreover, the house of Claudius Censitulus stood upon the said hill. Also the house of the Tartici, who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewise the house of Junius Senator, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were consumed with fire, the image of Tiberius remained unburnt. There also it is said that Titus Claudius Cyprius, the maker of hymns, in this hill was the great Masellum, the cave or den of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the armory.

CHAP. XXIV.

The water Appia, and Nova. The Temple of Isis, Virtue, Honour, Quirinus.

Mars, and the river Alma.

Now follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Aventine toward the beginning from the arch of Constantine, reacheth as far as Brundisium and became afterwards it was paved and repaired by Caracalla, it took the name of Nova, because it was newly begun, it is properly called Nova, beginning at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill, over the great Circus called Maximus, stretcheth out as far as to the lowest fifth-pool, where now standeth the Church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there, were called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and lest ye think that to be spoken of ones, which oftentimes was meant of many.

Between the Church of Sixtus, the Fifth-pools, and the ruins of the Antonian baths, there was the Church of S. Antonodoricus, built by Antonius Balbinus.

The Temple of Honour and Virtue, not far from the street Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus, at Castidium in Gaul; and seventeen years after dedicated by this son Marcus.

Two Temples there were of Mars, one called the Temple of Quirinus within the City near to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Appia without the City.

The river Alma runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Tyber. It beginneth ten miles from the City in the territory Marinum; which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appius. In this river the goddesses named the mother of the gods; was every year went to be washed by her Priests, called Galli.

CHAP. XXV.

Of baths and bairns in general.

Therma properly hath the signification from a Greek word, θερμη, which betokeneth hot. But we use to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heated with a stoup, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat by the Greek name Therma. That the Romans used in old to bath and wash themselves oftner than we now adooies, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers: and for sundry causes they were wont to do so [as yet the manner is amongst us] namely to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like sort for health and pleasure: whereby it came to pass, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath of hot-house by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after divers and sundry sorts. For many publique baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleasure. Servius Quirinus invented first and made the pendans or hanging baths. But after that riot and superfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measure, as appeareth by the very reliques and ruins thereof at this day. And those places where they built these bairns and hot-houses they called Therma; which contained within them divers places, and an infinite number of rooms, bearing sundry names, and serving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat water (and those were round built) from whence hot water was let into the bairns, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft; which water after they had done washing, being foul and good for nothing, was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into finks. They had other rooms also called Apodyteria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their cloaths and laid them by. In the same places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed roofs most finely; wherein were marble pillars, garnished with divers and sundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls leaved and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries, groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights drew and allured mens minds, as that they would wash oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these bairns the Princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons wholeover as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set out. And namely, Antoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Therma Antonia. The huge ruins thereof are yet to be seen, some of the pillars still stand, others are thrown down. Some say, they were begun only by Antoninus, but finished and adorned by Servius. They stood about the foot of the Aventine near the street way leading to Ardea, where now is the Church of S. Balbina. Under these baths there stood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shew thereof.

CHAP. I.

The Etymology of the mount Aventine.

The Aventine is of the Roman hills the fourth in order. The compass and form whereof, because we have already described in the first book, needles here it is to repeat. But it redifies be therein. The Aventine therefore, some think, took the name of Avens which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to nestle: others, of a King of the Albans, slain and buried there. There be again who suppose, that the Sabines, who being by the Romans sent forth to Verres, there settled and made abode gave the name to this hill. Avens river in their first passage, was divided from the rest, and from the City: for as it hath sent forth a tribut before this mount would go to it used to ferry over in small punts or wherries. Some give credit to them that name of resort unto it, for that the Latines used in great frequency to resort to the temple of Diana there. Remains also it was named of Romus who chose a place there to build his city, for to take the flight of birds for Augury, and in the end was there entered: Numa his brother. This hill Avens Marius afterward compassed with a wall, and granted leave to as many as would there to dwell: howsoever, there be some that think it stood void until the time of Claudius the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunate, by reason of foul birds that haunted it, and therefore not to be received within the walls. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joyned this mountain allo to the rest of the City.

CHAP. II.

The Temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, Queen Juno, Moneta, Luna, Victory, Minerva, and Liberty. The Altar of Jupiter Elicius.

In the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the Church of S. S. diana, that was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it chapel was built by K. Ancus of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been translated thither from Politorium. This Temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they resorted thereunto.

Very near unto that place stood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventinus. But in times past the place was consecrated to the goddess Bona, i.e. good. For Claudia a vestall virgin or Nun, built a chapel unto her in the honour of Favus, a filter of Favus, a most chaste maid.

Upon the same bank and brow of the hill, where at this day S. Alexius Church standeth, was sometime the Temple of Hercules Conqueror. And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus also of Arduus, where the Christians afterwards consecrated a Church to S. Prisca.

Thus much of those buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge: the rest following were doubtless in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they stood, it is now unknown after so long time, and namely, the Temple of Vesta built by the Arcadians, and in honour of whom they offer sacrifice yearly. Minerva and Juno had their Temples there in the same father of T. Gracchus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloister belonging to all by Pollio also re-edified. Now this S. Liberty the Romans honoured above all others and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever shewed themselves most resolute and constant.

Upon the same hill, Numa reared the altar of Jupiter Elicius, so called ab eliciendo, i.e. of fetching out secrets and hidden mysteries.

In like manner there stood an old altar of Murea in that hill. Now they named Murea of the Myrtle tree consecrated unto her: or as some interpret, because Venus, immoderate and excessive, maketh a man to be Mureus of Mureduis, i.e. sluggish, slothful, idle, and good for nothing.

The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill, Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chapel to dame Mama.

The wood or grove, also called Laurentum or Luventina, consecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian the second son of Constantine, and Galla Placidia was slain, as Pliny witnesseth.

CHAP. III.

Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Cacus, by report of the Poets, was the son of Vulcan, whom they believed in old time to breathe out of his mouth fire and smoke. This Cacus infested the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is that he was a most lewd and thevish servant of Evander, and therefore the Arcadians called him κακός, i.e. naught. A cave he haunted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-against the Church of S. Mary Aventine, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vast and huge craggy rock, as fit a place as might be to make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and sacrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Inventor, near to the said cave or den.

CHAP. IIIII.

The Armilustrum, and some other things in general.

Armilustrum was a place where souldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where they used to muster; where also in their arms they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with resounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximus; but that matters not much. Hither the souldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat custody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrum, or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to say, a steep place with a downfall; where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook, were most miserably executed and killed.

There stood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis.

A part of this mountain was called Remuria which Remus chose to dwell in: and being there by his brother Romulus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Deciana, and others also near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bains of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Eunus and Picus also were in the Aventine, as fables report, Italus likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in general were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tiberius, sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V.

The sheard hill, and other things within that compass.

The plain and level ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four sides, but uneven: in which there riseth a little hill, commonly called Teflacens. The whole compass hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces; the height is about 160 foot. It seemeth in shew the form of a gourd; and the one side of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glasse-makers street (and the potters) also the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth, but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Teflacens. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adaies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colleges or societies of potters: and these made of clay, not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work seeld in the outside, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in copins of baked clay. Since then, in so great store of earthen vessels and potters work, much of necessity must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitful; again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the channell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to sing all that was good for nothing, as filth, ruff, raff, and broken sheards into one place: whereupon, in process of time arose a mount which they called Teflacens. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrteas, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI.

The Pyramides; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

The Pyramides were huge towers four-square, rising up in height, sharp like to a flane, whereof they have the name ἀπὸ τῆς πυρὸς, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus supposeth they were to be called, ἀπὸ τῆς πυρῆς, i.e. of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of

of all Egypt; which made a great dearth of corn. These at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Egypt; thereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no use; for fear lest if they had gathered goods, and heaped up a deal of gold, silver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in wait to take their lives away: also, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewise they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to shew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be seen, standing upright at the gate Hastenis, enclosed within a wall. And commonly it is said that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cestius, one of the seven Septemvirs, called Ephlones. But Blondus would seem to prove, that it was the place for: buriall of the whole College and Society of those Septemvirs Ephlones. Now were they called Ephlones, who had the power to ordain and make feasts and solemn banquets to the gods.

It is written, that there were 140 garners of the people of Rome, between the mount Teflacens and Tyber.

In the same compass of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylernus. Some also affirm, that there stood sometime in that quarter a little town called Copona.

CHAP. VII.

The sweating steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

By course the Esquilie should next follow; but because it lieth between the way Laticana on the Southeast side, and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foot enloseth that way) on the West: we will rehearse what memorable things forever there be in the Labican way and the valley afore said before we come to the mount Esquilie. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Constantine, whereof we spake before, we will as we go discourse of the rest. Near then unto this arch there appeareth the half rundle or circumference of an old steeple made of brick, which Vittor calleth the sweating steeple: for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water out of it; whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffolds of the Theatre until they were almost quenched their drought.

In the top hereof stood the brazen image of Jupiter, became their ancestors in old time were wont when they made solemn leagues to use the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to send the said image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in far remote countries, therefore instead of the complete image they took the scepter only: which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.

The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus. The Temple of Fortune and Quies.

Between the two hills Calvus and Esquilie was there an Amphitheatre. This Vespasian built first, and afterward Titus his son dedicated and beautified it with the bains, built near unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colosseum, of Nero's Colosseum, which was set up in the porch of Nero's house. In the same place of the Theatre were the pooles before time of Nero, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatre they called also Arenas, i.e. the Sand-floor, because the ground was spread over and laid with sand that the wrestlers might fall softer and take less hurt: also that the blood should be drunk up, to the end that the sword-fencers in combat might not be afraid upon the sight thereof, and lo with less cheerfulness and courage let upon their concurrent: and last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were anointed with oyl, being betwixt with the sand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it self within (which during those daies of the games was covered over with tent-cloth) would receive 80000 men. But hereof see more in Pliny, Pompeius, Leius, and other writers of the Roman aas.

Fulvius Flaccus built unto Fortune (last by this Amphitheatre) so goodly a Temple, as for stature and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable unto it. Besides it, there were many other chappels at Rome consecrated to Fortune.

Likewise a Chappell of Quietnes and rest was built in the broad street Laticana.

CHAP. IX.

Of Esquilie.

The mount Esquilie as well by Varron as others is divided into many parts, and each part thereof took the name of those captains who in times past, before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Cilpinus, another, Oppius and a third Sepim. But hercof Varron writeth at large. The posterity following changed those names, as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Esquilie took the name of Excubias, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great trust in Tiberius, he used to have a standing watch by night for fear he should be secretly forsaken and killed, or else turned out of his kingdom. Others suppose it was so named of toilers, who there used to cast forth chaff, and such refuse of light corn, to begnie and catch the poor birds.

The

The side of the hill toward the broad way Laticlavia, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vinculis, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Corina, as Levy seemeth to testify. From that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall do well to begin our treatise.

CHAP. X.

The Carinae, the old Curia and the new.

These Carinae, according to their model and form were houses like to keels of ships, standing within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are yet to be seen near the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, i.e. in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus: but the new was erected near to Comptum Fabricium, i.e. the Quarrefour or cross way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

The bairns of Titus and Philip: the Statue of Laocoon: the Palace of Vespasian: the houses of Balbus and Pompey.

There remain yet to be seen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bairns, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hills: for there be great cisterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septim Sula, according to the number of those cisterns: and so far reached the house of Nero, and Aurelia, i.e. golden.

Not far from thence in the year of our Lord 1566 one Felix a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the Statue of Laocoon, made by those excellent workmen, Agasander, Polydorus and Athenodorus, Rhodians who with wonderful cunning portraited and cut most artificially in one inire stone, Laocoon himself, the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about him. And now at this day is to be seen at the Vatican, in the place of Vespasian near the said bairns of Titus, See more of this you may in Pliny, As for the story it self, most learnedly and lively it is set out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these bairns of Titus, between East and North, the ruins of others besides are thought verily to be those of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bairns of Titus, some few Hadrian bairns: for that this place is yet called Hadrianus. By the testimony of Lampridius it appeareth that Balbus his house was in Corina. There also was Pompey house, in which Lenaxus his freed-servant taught grammar.

CHAP. XII.

The cliff Virbius, the house of Servius Tullius, i.e. golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil, Mecenas his tower and hortiards: the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

That part of the Esquilie which overlooketh the Church of S. Lawrence in Fontana, is named Clivus Virbius: there also is the grove Fagutalis, wherein stood the mansion house of Servius Tullius.

Nero's house called Golden took up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregories Church standeth lay between Constantines arch, the Colosseum, the Carina, Esquilie, and Mecenas hortiards. His house before was in his own fire wherewith he burnt the City consumed also: and when he re-edified it anew, he called it Aurea. The spacious largeness wherewith it was, that it had about it three porches of a mile compass apiece. It contained also a pool like another sea: walled it was about, and resembled a very City. There were to it belonging hols and hamlets country-like, vineyards pastures, woods, and beasts both tame and wild, or all sorts. The house and the porches were double guilded all over, and set out with precious stones. And in one world there was nothing wanting that might serve for pleasure or prodigall riot.

In the entry of this house there stood an huge image giant-like, called a Colossus, 120 foot high. After Nero's death, dedicated it was to the sun, and then charged the name. Now men think it was called Colossus after his name who was the first deviser of all such figures.

Within the same house Nero included also the chappell of Fortune. This goddes being made of the stone Phengites, when all the doors were shut, gave light to the whole house within: such rays of radiant brightness casteth this kind of stone from it. This goddes Servius Tullius first consecrated, and of Severus i.e. standing corn, called her Seia.

At the bairns of Dioctavian, there is a street-way leading up to S. Antones Church in Esquilie, where Diocletian sometime a most noble tower of Mecenas within his own hortiards: for those most pleasant hortiards were in the plain of Esquilie. Here-within was Prapus worshipped: upon which hill-favored Idol Virgil hath played much in verie.

Near the hortiards of Mecenas stood the said Virgil house. The Temple of Felicity, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-house should stand was by him burnt.

Above those gardens or hortiards of Mecenas was raised a wonderful piece of work, called Aggeres Targuinis Superbi, i.e. Targuinus bulwarks.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

The Palace of Sisiminius: the plain and market place of Esquilie: the grove Querquetulanus: also that of Juno Lacinia, and of Mars: the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

The palace of Sisiminius in Esquilie, stood (as they say) where the Church of S. Mary the great-ter now is.

The plain or field Esquilie, near the tower of Mecenas (called Inter montes), among the hills, is between the foresaid bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times past called Fortuna, because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the stinking steam thereof was no more to the City, the Citizens and Augustus after by a general consent gave the field unto Mecenas, where he made his goodly hortiards and most dainty gardens, of which Cicero, with other, speaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Esquilinum was in the same hill. That side of the Esquilie which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus had in it the grove of Juno Lacinia.

In the same Esquilie was the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune. In the way which goeth to the gate Interagere, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Targuinus stood the arch of Gordian: made of marble, garnished also and set out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregories Church in Damasus built.

CHAP. XIV.

The cliff Suburanus: the arch of Caligulus: the bimbles or fish-market of Livia, or as some would have it, Livium: the cross-stone way, and the Trophees of Marius.

At the top or upper end of Subura was the Clivus Suburanus, so called of Subura, yielding an easie ascent from thence up into the Esquilie.

Among you meet with the triumphal arch of Caligula the Emperor (where now standeth the Church of S. Petrus) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine Rome, wherewith it was made. Near unto it was the bimbles or market-place called Macellum Liviae, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Mucellus, who being a notorious thief, and practising much to steal into the City, was in the end apprehended and by the Censors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscated, and the City was converted to a place wherein they sold meat and all other victuals: and so it down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name still of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Prænestina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina. In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick half ruined upon which were erected two Trophees of marble; that is to say, certain posts, like half ruinat upon which with spoils of enemies hanging thereupon; and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is said, that these Trophees were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbrian war: which when Sylla had cast down and overthrow, C. Cæsar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophees, look to the read more in Plutarch, Valerius Maximus, and others.

CHAP. XV.

The house of the Ælii: the chappell Marianum: the region or quarter called Tabernola: the bairns and dwelling house of Gordian: the Palace of Caius and Lucius: also the Palace Licinianum.

The house of the Ælii stood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappell of that name.

The plain part of the Esquilie, between it and the mount Celivus, and the Basilica Lætarensis, is at this day called Merulina, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Near the Church of S. Enfilius, in the way of Prænestina, was built the bairns and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of those hot-houses are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimable ruins: this they commonly call, the bairns of Galatius. But in that place stood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Cæsar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his ne-phews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbins, whereas now is the Bear called Pileatus, stood sometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI.

The water Martia or Trajana: and the Temple of Ysis.

The current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Esquilie, went as far as to the bairns of Dioctavian, unto the hills next adjoining. This in old time was called Ansera. It riseth out of the spring Picena in the mountains of the Pelignis, and passeth by the the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and so runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholesome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Ancon Marcius began first to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Marcius, surnamed Res, took it in hand; and a long time after Agrippa repaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Vilius placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Suburra; the house of Cæsar and Lælia; and the street Patricius.

Suburra is a street of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on forward directly by the Forum Nervæ up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Clivus Suburanus, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Franciscana beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it sustained and bare up the Carina and the wall under it: or because it lay under the old City; or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough or street Succurram. In this street Suburra was the house of Cæsar, so long as he contented himself with a mean estate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth.

The street Patricius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis, and endeth at the bairns of Dioclesiana. Of it more hath been said in the former book.

The house of Lælia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Suburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

The mount Viminalis on the West-side of it hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: and the valleying between was named Suburra the plain.

In the same valley in times past were the ten Tavernæ; so called of the number.

The pit also of S. Proba was in the same hill: which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Marcellus in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminalis, over-against S. Agatha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Læver of Agrippina; the bairns of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Cæcilius, Crassus, and C. Aquilius.

Varro reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Esquilæ. Viminalis it was named of Jupiter Viminalis, whose altars were in that hill: or else of plenty of Ofers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Laurence in Panisperna) the Palace of Decius the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agrippina mother to Nero.

The bairns of Olympias were situate toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the bairns of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Prudence standeth.

The hill Viminalis had also three goodly houses of most noble personages, to wit, of M. Crassus, Quintus Cæcilius, and Caius Aquilius: the marks whereof are evident to be seen in the side of the said hill.

Upon the same hill in times past a certain feastsall sacrifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Fagatal.

CHAP. XX.

The bairns of Dioclesianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interagere; and the vale Quirinalis.

The bairns of Dioclesian are to be seen all ruinat on the side of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begun by Dioclesian and Maximinian Herbulanus: in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to work many years together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximinian, new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expences which the Romans laid out upon Bains, read Seneca, who depaupereth out their wastfulness most excellently.

In the same bairns was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajan, was thither translated: wherein were the linen records, and those huge volumes, called the Elephantine books, in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the sanctions and ordinances of Senat were, as Pollio witnesseth.

Behind

Behind these bairns, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Interagere shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth that it stood in the plain Esquilina.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivarium, or the pool betwixt within which park they kept enclosed divers and lundry kinds of wild beasts. The harbours and dens of these wild beasts are yet to be seen: whereupon it cometh that those places or parks which are let out and appointed for feeding they call, that Romulus met with Proculus.

The space between Dioclesian's baths and Constantine's arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they lay, that Romulus met with Proculus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus: the Etymology of Quirinalis: the tower Militarium; the bairns of Paulus; the chappell of Neptune: the bairns of Constantine: the house, and seat of the Comiti.

The hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signs and reasons may be proved; so as no man skillfull in the Roman history, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinal hill, the sixth in order of the mountains of Rome (as Varro testifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus: after others, of the Quintus, who coming with Tatius from Cures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long: for it comprehendeth that little hill which is between the gate Collina and Collatina. Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraven with Egyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower, now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill, above the Forum of Trajanus, you shall see the tower called Militarium: where in old time the souldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridge were the bairns of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagiana-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinal hill toward Suburra stood sometime the chappell of Neptune, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do testifie.

The house of the Cornelii was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepeth still. But more hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn, the Sun, and Bacchus; Quirinus his Temple and porch; the old Capitol; the Chappells of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; the house of Pomponius Atticus.

In the Cornelian street (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images, called Colossi resembling two old men, naked, and holding Cornucopia in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the statues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the very ruins thereof, which testifie so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mæsa. This men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshippeth the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription; Soli invictæ, To the invincible Sun. His mother also, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the side of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horses seen standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Tridates the Kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Vallis Murcia was called the mount and Temple of Clara and Apollo.

Not far from thence behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent: where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitol stood, together with the chappell of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vitalis, Pomponius Atticus dwelt in a house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfather, and was called Pamphiliana. They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept always shut, to signifye that it was an unknown secret: whether Romulus were emiered and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in heaven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name: where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contractions.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

The path-way or cansty called Alta; the house of Sabinus; the street and statue of Mamurrus; the Court and gardens of Salust, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

The high cauley reaching from the baths of Constantine to the gate Viminalis along the side of Quirinalis was paved with four-square stone.

Upon that cauley, at a place called the Pomgranat, Flavius Sabinus had an house, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a street of Mamurrus: and that his statue there stood where now is S. Sufani Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Salust, and his most neat and fine horticards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those horticards, as also of the hamlet Tiburina, there yet continue some marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is seen the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salustrium. Of this matter see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the horticards of Salust, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount: where in times past the vestall votary Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dius Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; also the Senat-house of women.

The mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they stood is not so well known at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudian. By Junius Bubulcus Dictator when he triumphed, but the Equians it was vowed by him (Centor) put to making, and in his second Dictatorship dedicated.

* Deum Trino-minia Salu-
tis.

Sancit, Dius, and Fidius, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other household gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (forsooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they said: These three therefore had one temple built upon this hill, and were called by one name, Sancit. The opinion received of which godhead was such, that an oath was thought to carry a great power of sanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity avowed and swore thus, Me Deus Fidius.

Domitius, a Prator or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia.

Besides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewise the Council-house of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain solemn set daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Agonialis was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The Court or Forum Archimonium; the pillar Tiburina; the house of Martial; the Cirque of Floralia; the Temple of Flora; the Shop of Minium, and the common ascent called Cilivus Publicus.

Between the hill Hortulorum (whereof ye may read before in the first book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley four-square, but lying somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clivus and Apollo, was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Nicholas, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Michiboniti.

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tiburtina: There stood the house of Martial, as he himself witnesseth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddess Flora the festival Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous courtesan or strumpet at Rome, who having by her whores trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her heirs with this condition. That every year they should celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this a ridiculous mockery to honour and dignify so fitly a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddess of flowers, forsooth called Flora, and her upon those holidays they seemed to please and content, that the would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowering and blooming time. To this goddess we read that a Temple likewise was consecrated: Anon you meet with the work-houses where they make Minium, i.e. Vermilion, Near unto which was the Cilivus Publicus.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortulorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the sepulchre of Nero.

This little hill (Hortulorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincius a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in these daies are called, Mount Pincius, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the same wall we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half circle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Upon the same hill over-against the tomb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, fast by the monument of Domitian stood Nero's sepulchre also.

Now this hill Hortulorum took the name of certain horticards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered were most fruitful. Down this hill all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martius, who meant to sue and stand for any Magistracy.

The sixth Book.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in general.

That it may be understood more certainly in what place of the plain and levell part of the City every thing stood, let there be a straight and right line drawn from the Capitoll, through Pantheon to Tyber, near the Church of S. Roch. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flamentana, along the foot of the two hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly translated Visorium. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and thence in regard of husbandmen, who on festival daies visited the Temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to be taken up. The first, and that the greatest of all others was built of timber by M. Scavrus: for, the concavity front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Purpurinus, who have written plentifully thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia.

Augustus built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in sundry works. And among the rest was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or cousin by his sister Octavia. A part hereof is yet to be seen between the Capitoll and Tyber, where now standeth the palace of the Sabelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Ammianus.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallery of Octavia, reared by the said Augustus for his sister's ravishing of Procopius. The portraiture of Bacchus & Satyrus, also Apollo, Diana, and the nine muses, the workmanship of Timarchides. Within this gallery or walking place, Pliny saith, there stood a chappel of Juno, and the image of the said goddess. Fast by the said gallery stood the court as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nicholas in Carcere and S. Mary in Portico. After the death of Marcellus Octavia his mother let up a library near his Theatre. Now the first that is ordained. That books of all learning, should be in time public place: bestowed for to be read of all that would come; was at Athen Pisistratus the tyrant, and at Rome Agnus Poellio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or new place Flaminia, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminia stood in that place where at this day the dark store-houses and cellars be heard by S. Katharine church, the marks yet remaining testify. Flaminia was called either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminus, or else by Flaminius the Col, who was slain at the battell of the lake Thymensis. But were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apoloniarum: and then the horse-runnings were performed. To it the Senat used oftentimes to come down from the Capitoll to sit in council. Neptune also had a chappel there.

Apollo's

Apollo's Temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Maria's Church is under the Capitol, between the herb market and the Cirque Flaminius, near to the gate Carmentalis.

CHAP. III.

The Temples of Victory, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Sator: the column of Philip Bellina: the altar of Neptune: the gallery Corinthia: and the Colosse of Mars.

WITHIN the Cirque Flaminius stood most famous Temples of the gods; to wit, of Mars, Mars, and Bellona, to wit, that which was toward the gate Carmentalis. Before the said gate there stood a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellona; for it shewed when war was to be made. The Romans in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: The publicke herald, or one of the heralds called Faciatis, planted a spear with some other ensigns of war, into that land upon which they meant to levy arms. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defiance to nations far remote and distant, because they should not need to bring a spear or javelin, as I said before, into that land, they did but stick one in the pillar above named, on that side which regardeth that part whither they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, protector and keeper of the cirque Flaminius, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there erected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now standeth the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apollonia.

M. Fulvius built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Censors Rock, to Hercules Musarmus: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagitis, i. e. the leader and companion of the Muses. The same Fulvius translated the images of all the Muses out of the town Ambrosia to Rome; and consecrated them under the protection and safeguard of that most potent and mighty deity: to the end that they might have mutual help one of the other: namely, the quierness of Muses by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This Church much decayed and disfigured by time, Marius Philippus, Augustus his father in law, i. e. his mother's husband repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Jupiter Sator to stand.

There also as they gather by certain presumptions, was the altar of Nephrum, which in old time ran blood.

Octavius reared a porch or gallery built and born up with brazen pillars; and thereupon named Corinthia. This stood between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church; and was also called Chalcidicus, i. e. brazen or copper.

The Coloss of statue of Mars, at the Cirque Flaminius, was in the Temple of Brutus Cunctator.

CHAP. V.

The porch or gallery of Mercury: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloister, and gallery: and the Temple of Venus Victrix.

BETWEEN the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Agnell in Piscina, there is a porch or gallery, consecrated sometime to Mercury, or as some would have it, to Juno. This being consumed with fire, L. Septimius Severus reedified. But the porch which standeth in the Jews street called Cura, they say was built by the Emperor Severus.

Between the gallery of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and shewes were once done and past: and when need required, new were set up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished, comes Caligula and made an end of the rest. Afterward, Theodoric K. of the Ostrogoths reedified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near unto this Theatre there was a court or stately Hall, called Atrium, the same which at this day they name Saturnus; also the house of Pompey: & a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plays, were consumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Tiberius Caesar.

In the foresaid Theatre (men say) was the Temple of Venus the Victrix.

CHAP. VI.

The baine Agrippina: Pantheon, and the porch thereof: also the Temple of good speed.

FROM the arch of Pompey, as you go northward; you shall meet with the baths Agrippinae, the marks whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Cymbella. Now, Agrippina they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Pliny hereof in his discourses of Nature.

Near unto the foresaid baine, there is a Temple of prelate antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest; which at this day remaineth in manner whole and sound. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they call it S. Mariae the round. Of this the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the readers. In the very porch and entry of this temple, were the statues of Augustus and Agrippa. The images of Mars and Venus. At the lappet of Venus ear, there hung as a pendant that most costly pearl of Cleopatra, whose statue the Carthaginians in old time used yearly to sacrifice mankind. They ascended up and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined a peece of work thing else but an ornament or porch, as this Pliny saith, before the door. Herof also have authors written much. This temple itself Hadrian the emperor of happy memory, and afterwards Antoninus Pius, reedified.

Certain reliques and remnants four angled and somewhat long, of Good-speeds temple, are evidently seen in the streets of Minerva and S. Enfaebius. This god was long ago worshipped, that all things might fall out happily in the end. Portraied he was in habit of a poor man, holding in his right hand a charger, and in the left an ear of corn.

CHAP. VII.

The baine of Nero and Alexander: the Cirque named Agon.

BEHIND S. Enfaebius church, between Pantheon and Lombardi street, the remnants are seen of the baine and vaults of Nero.

Near unto these Alexander built others new (by conveyance of water into them, which they call Alexandrina) and those very fair and delectable: Whereof Lampridius hath written much.

Near unto them (some think) were the baths of Hadrian: and they would have them to stand in that very place where now is S. Aloisius church.

In the plain part of the City there appear most evident tokens of a long and spacious Cirque: which they call at this day Agon. It took that name either of the games Agonalia instituted by K. Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that (few place are reprinted) the 9 day of January; or because all manner of such shewes and sports, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the manner of the Princes and Emperors was, ordinarily to bestow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Neptune, Terentus: the Altar of Dis or Pluto: the marsh Caprea.

ON the strand of Tyber, where now S. Blasius Church standeth, sometimes Nephtunes temple fenced the shipwracks.

Terentus is a place in Mars field, so called, for that in it the altar of Dis was hidden; or because the water of the Tyber running thereby, eat away and wore the banks of that side: or lastly by occasion of Evander, who arrived with a fleet in that place, and there abode. There also in time of the Alban war, they hid the altar of Proserpina under the ground, that they only might have knowledge thereof, where it was.

In the same Mars field (some think) was the fen or marsh Caprea, where Romulus in a tempest which suddenly arose, was taken a way. Of which matter Livy writeth.

CHAP. X.

The house Corvina: the broad way or gate: and the temple of Isis.

THE second part of the flat City, reached along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flaminia. In which part near the Capitol, was the house Corvina, built by that name and family, and to this day keepeth still the old name; for commonly called it is Maecellum Corvorum.

From that house unto the bars or railles in Mars field, extendeth the way Lata, retaining yet the antique name; and there standeth the church of S. Mariae in the broad way.

In the same way stood sometime by report, the temple of Isis near the rails above said, where now is the church of S. Marcellus. Now this Isis was a goddess of the Egyptians. She was honoured and worshipped also at Rome, together with Osiris (named Serapis of whom the publick plaies in the quarter Flaminia, from Serapion bare the name. It hapned in the temple of Isis that crucified; whereupon the Emperor Tiberius caused the Priests of that temple to be crucified; & the place itself to be demolished. Other temples of this goddess there were at Rome, for Caracalla translated all her sacred rites and ceremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence observed the same.

CHAP. XI.

The arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva: and the swine market.

As a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforesaid toward the Pantheon, he shall see a most ancient arch. Some think (but untrue) that erected it was for Camillus: for many a fair day after his time, these arches were in no request and use: and therefore it belonged to some other. L. General, Between this arch and Pantheon, M. Pampinus built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprised in a compendious sum, the memorial of his acts and exploits. Other enignes also in the honour of the City of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. Whereof read Pliny.

At the foot of the mount Quirinalis, in the hort-yards and the Columnnes, near to the ascent & rising of the hill which leadeth now into the mount Caballus, there was sometime the market-place Swarium, so called of selling of swine there. For Varro witnesseth, that in old time they had certain set and appointed places for the selling of certain things, and thereof the markets took the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium; of fish, Piscarium, of swine, Swarium; of worts or herbs, Hortorium, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

Forasmuch as in the former book it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it lay, it shall be needlesse to make any repetition thereof in this place: but why it was called Martius would be here in briefe considered. Named so it was, because it was consecrated to Mars: for when the Tarquins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessed of, they divided amongst those Citizens who were not landed at all, reserving only this field Martius: which because it was consecrated to Mars, that in it the games and places should be solemnized and the youth exercised, they thought that the fruit also there growing should likewise be counted sacred and accursed, and so deemed it unlawful that any distribution thereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tyber, whereof arose the land called Tyberinus, of which we will speak in the last book. In this field therefore (besides the native beauty of the place and the delectable sight of the meadows) were erected the ornaments and statues of brave & renowned persons: yea, and out of the very Capitoll (when the place began to be pestered and overstrait by reason of so many ornaments which thither were daily brought, many of them were from thence translated into Campus Martius). This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus, like as Tyber also was named Martius.

CHAP. XIII.

The porch, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Pius: the rails or enclosure, called Ovilia.

Between the Sciarra & Pantheon streets, near to Saint Stephens Church in Trullis, there sheweth a stately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antonius Pius, for that his temple standeth so near. The Column also of Antonius is not far off. This he raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning stairs, like that of Trajanus, whereof we have spoken before. Between this Column and the porch, the said Emperor had (by report) a goodly palace. Between the said Column and the water Virgo, they say, the rails or enclosure within Mars field stood, called Septa. Now this place was enclosed within wooden rails, and strongly fenced with posts on every side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrates they were to passe their voices were kept close: and for the resemblance of sheep pens, Ovilia of some they were called. By Livy they are set down, near the wives Fornicata and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIV.

The hill Citatorum: the Villa Publica, temple of Neptune, and the bridge in Mars field.

Between Antoninus Column and S. Lawrence's church in Lucina, there is raised a mount, called now Citatorum, for Citatorum; nor it was a mount indeed, but because the people of Rome, when in the choosing of magistrates they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went thither as it were unto some hill. Some say it was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples suffrages: others Septorum, for the vicinity of those Septa before said. This little mount, there be that would have to rise and increase by the ruins of some porch or stately gallery; or else of the common Hortus, called Villa Publica. For there was in times past a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall, wherein were received and entertained all ambassadors of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the public lodging or Hospit: called Græcostasis.

Near to the Septa, M. Agrippa (as Denis writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautiful porch to it, in the honour of Neptune.

At this aforesaid hillock called Citatorum, and the Column of Antonius, there was a bridge fast by The Topography of Rome.

by the Septa, whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, passed by and went their waies: and so were levered from the rest that were to give their last-ages, side they had passed their voices.

In the same Mars field, it is recorded that in times past flood the temple of Pietas, even whereas now the church of S. Saviour is.

CHAP. XV.

The water Virgo: the lake and chapel of Salutina, as also that of Pietas.

The water Virgo, which retaineth still the pleasant sweetness to the tast in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head near the bridge Salutina, and being carried in a most deep gutter, encreth into the City at the gate Colina, and so is raised to the hill to the inhabitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the hort-yards of Lucullus, of K. Turnus, yielding most wholesome water. This water-Nymph, they vouch (and that right well) to have been called Salutina, a juvenile, it of helping: because she was thought to help the sick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Laetigio.

CHAP. XVI.

The arch of Domitian: the obelisk of Mars field: the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

The triumphant arch, so dismembred (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvester and Lawrence in Lucinum, and taketh up a peece of the way of street Flaminia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon be it less others place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mars field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Egypt to Rome. Besides, the native enignes and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no lesse admirable. But hereof it is better to read Pliny.

Claudius the Emperor built near the Septa in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked & adorned with fair statues and most beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.

The vale Martia: the palace: the porch of Augustus: the Naumachie of Domitian and the temple of the family Flavia.

The vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lieth between Tyber and the hills Hortorum: within the which, in a place lower than all the rest about it, appear the Naumachie of Domitian; where in old time he exhibited shews of naval fights. In which place before, as retained after wards his name. Read Suetonius.

Near to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kindred Flavia. In this place, Julius Cæsar proved that the porch and palace of Augustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Mausoleum of Augustus: and the two obelisks near it: also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

In the vale Martia between the way Flaminia and the bank of Tyber, hard by S. Rocher church, Augustus made a Mausoleum; to serve for a sepulchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a turret standing at the gate called it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus, named this sepulchre that set it out. Men would have resemblance had of that of Maufolus K. of Caria, which Artemisia his wife built for him. Read Cassiodorus Strabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Mausoleum of Augustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinant remnants thereof do testify.

CHAP. XIX.

The way Flaminia: the Trophees of Marius, other goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

C. Nens Flaminius the colleague of M. Lepidus, having vanquished the Ligurians paved the cauley or street Flaminia. This was led from Placentia, through Narnia, Fulginetum, Nuceria, Calatium to Fortunæ temple, to Pisurnum, and so forward to Ariminum. See Livy and Suetonius.

Cccccc

Between

Between the Maufolcum of Augustus, and the hill called Hortulorum, were the Trophæes of Marius over Jugurtha, Trophæes as Varro willeth, were fo called of εγχα Greek word, which fignifieth, fligt; for that the manner was to hang up the spoils and drowings of enemies put to fligt and flain, upon trunks and polls.

In Mars field, were the sepulchres of Sylla, Hirtius, and Pansa, of Italia, Britannicus, Dryfus the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, befide infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

The seventh Book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

IT should follow by due courfe and order, to treat of Taniculum and all that quarter of the City on the other fide of Tybre; but becaufe thefe parts are feparate from the reft of the City by the river Tybre between; thereof alfo it is meet to fay fomewhat briefly. And firft truly the reafon of that name fhould be fhewed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis from the Ulyffes. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the Carthaginians in battel, and taken a number of them prifoners, enjoined them, for the better fortification of their own City, to caft a trench about it, and to let water thereinto; and this ditch in reproch of their enemies, they called Ulyffes. And the fame men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped near Rome, gave this very name unto this river alfo, whereas before it was called Albula. Some think it was named fo of Tyberis a King of the Tufcans, flain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberius, a neighbour Prince of the Veitians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar fpeech they call it Tybris in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumon, as it were, gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Alfo at one fide of the City it was named Tarentum, as a man would fay, wearing the banks. It fpringeth from the Apennine, above Arnum. At the firft it is but (mall and fhallow, but before it enureth into Rome, it (having received 40 other rivers) is encreafed to fuch bignefs, that fhips of burden and the greateft hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tufcan from Vmbria, the Sabina country and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and fo paffeth through Southwards, between the gates Hofianfa and Portuensis, leaving Taniculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and fo neer unto Hofia is difcharged into one mean broad fream, and falleth into the Tyrrhene fea. Upon the banks hereof, as if they were confecrate to fome divine power, it was not lawfull to fet up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the channell and the banks. But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

THE Tybre, as is abovefaid, being fo deep, as that it is navigable, and beareth the greateft fhips, hath no foord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore neceffary it was to make bridges over it, and fo to join that part on the farther fide of Tybre, to the reft of the City. He, celer, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards flood that which they called Sublucius. Alfo before the foundation of the City, there was a bridge over Tybre, called Sacer, upon which they facrificed men to Saturn by throwing them down into the river. But when Hercules afterwards had put down that manner of facrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reed and bulwifes (which they called Argæi) fhould be caft down in head of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Ælius, Palatinus, Taniculenſis, Cæſtus, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Sublucius. And all thefe, fave the Sublucius only, Tiberius overthrow.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Milvius.

THE bridge Milvius, which men now call Molvinus, standeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troubleſome times of Sylla, by Scæurus when he was Centor. Many a time they fay it was caft down, and as often let up again.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Ælius, now S. Angel, the Palatin or Triumphal the Taniculenſis or Aurelianus.

THE bridge at this day called S. Angel, in times paſt Ælius, took that name of Ælius Hadrianus, for he built that bridge, and neer unto it a ſepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriana. Beneath

The Topographie of Rome.

III 9

Beneath this is another which giveth paſſage into the mount Palatin and the plain the ſole, and thereupon they named it Palatinus alfo Triumphalis, for that over it hath won up in triumph, the Capitol to give thanks to Jupiter and rejoice. The pides are yet to be ſeen in Tybre, over againſt the Capitol or the Capitol of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Taniculenſis of Taniculum neer unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia or the gate fo called. Antonius Pius paved it over with marble, and being demolished in the civil wars, was called the broken bridge. Afterward Pope Xyſtus the fourth reedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V.

The bridge Fabricius and Cæſtus.

Beneath the bridge Aurelius one furlong, over-againſt the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very middle of the channell of Tybre, there appeareth a (mall or Iſland, this was united to the City by the bridge Tarpeius, fo called firſt of the rock Tarpeia neer unto it, afterwards Fabricius, of L. Fabricius, who by that bridge conjoined the City and Iſland together. The ſame at this day is called the bridge of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four faces appeere. Standing at the entry of the bridge, but that bridge which closeth the ſaid Iſland with the part within Tybre, was called Æſquilinus or Cæſtus in times paſt, but now S. Bartholomæus bridge.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Iſland Tiberina.

OF this Iſlands beginning, we have treated before in the deſcription of Mars field. It is broad, it is not above a dart ſhoot over, in length it containeth about two furlongs or thereabouts, whole image from out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Æſculapius and his temple read Pliny.

A temple alfo of Jupiter (standeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Dumvir, which ſtandeth vowed by L. Furius fix years before the Gauls war.

In the Iſland were ſick folk preſented unto Æſculapius (in the field). And neer unto the temple of the ſaid god, was a lazar-houſe, for that this god was the inventor and maintainer of Phyſick.

In it alſo flood the chappell of Faunus, neer to the very river; but ſcarcely remain there any tokens thereof. This Faunus (as men ſay) was reported to have been the firſt that confecrated chappels and temples to the gods, and for this caule, all ſuch places confecrated to the gods were called Fana. By the teſtimony of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius the ſtature of the emperor Julius flood there.

CHAP. VII.

The Senators bridge called alſo Palatinus, and that which is named Sublucius.

Beneath the abovenamed Iſland, as it were a darts caſt off, was the ſeventh bridge, Senators named it, of the Senators, alſo Palatinus, of the mount Palatine neer adjoining; and at this day named it is the bridge of S. Mary in Egypt, by reaſon of S. Maries church neer by.

Now followeth the laſt bridge Sublucius, and which alſo is counted the moſt ancient of all. It was firſt made of timber by Anagninus at the very foot of the Aventine mount; as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in peeces one from another. Now Sublucius it was called a Sublucius, a great ſtrong poſts, but afterwards Æmilius Lepidus made it of ſtone, and thereupon named the marble bridge. Upon it in old time ſat beggars craving of alms of the paſſengers. From it alſo leud and wicked malefactors, were thrown down headlong into Tybre. This bridge as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by one or other.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the ſide of the City which is beyond Tybre. The City and temple of the Ravenats and Fors Fortuna: the baſes of Severus: the horr-yards of Cæſar: the water Alſetina, & the meadows of Mucius.

THE region beyond Tybre in old time had the name of Taniculum, the hill which overlooketh the City of the Ravenats, who with a fleet having aided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Taniculum, for fear left at any time that mountain hold ſhould be ſeized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was inhabited by baſe people, it was followed by occupations, there were in it but few things worthy of any remembrance. Severus there ſat ſight there. Alſo the temple of Fors fortuna was (in Tib Cæſars daies) dedicated in that time. The water called Alſetina, was derived out of the poole Alſetinus, by the high way or c. d. d. c. c. c. c. 3

Claudia into the foresaid Naumachie, and served all those parts. This water was also called by some Angustia. See Frontinus, who hath written much of the Roman waters.
Munius, who willingly had exposted and offered himself to die for the love of his country, was for that good service endowed by the people of Rome with land on the other side of Tyber. The place at this day is yet called Prata Munia. Neer unto the Arsenal and ship-docks on the side of Tyber, were the plaies and games of Fishermen in times past celebrated.

CHAP. IX.

The sepulchre of Numa, and Cæcilius the Poet. The Tribunal of Aurelius, the Janiculum, and the horse-yard of Marcellus.

That the sepulchre of King Numa was under the hill Janiculum a chift of his, with his books long time after digged there, do sufficiently prove. See Livy, Solinus, and others.
 The Tribunal Aurelia, and the Arsenal was on that side of the Tyber, as appeareth by those authors.

The hill Janiculum took the name of Tannu: who there dwelt, & therein was afterwards buried. He also built a town or City there, as they say, so called, This Janiculum was also called Antipolis as Roma Saturnia.

Commonly also it is received, that Cæcilius the Poet was under the same hill Janiculum buried. Marital the Poet, as himself witnesseth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable horse-yards in the same Janiculum.

CHAP. X.

The hill and field Vaticane, the temple of Apollo and Mars, the Naumachie, the cirque horse-yards, and Obelisk of Cæsar.

The mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, in the parts beyond the Tyber, and in that very place, where at this day is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Vaticanus, of the god Vaticus by whose instinct & inspiration it was beleev'd in old time that propheties were delivered. And this god they called Vaticus, for that in power was the beginning of mans voice, for as much as infants, so soon as ever they come into the world, presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of this gods name, i. e. Va.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, whereon at this day is S. Petronius or Parnali church, also another of Mars, wherein standeth S. Marcellus in Februus. Upon the portway called sometime Triumphalis, Gellius writeth, that Julius Paulus the Poet had horse-yards in the Vaticane.

The vale Vaticane is there also to be seen, wherein Nero enclosed a compasse of ground like a ring for to ride and break horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there he adorned. Moreover, Nero had horse-yards in that place, which he let forth for divers and sundry punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque. Also the pools made for ship-fight, called Naumachie were there, and the Obelisk of Cæsar in the way Triumphalis is yet to be seen standing upright.

CHAP. XI.

The way or street Triumphalis, the water Sabbatina, the sepulchre of Scipio.

Of the Triumphall way, there hath been some mention made before. Called to it was, for that the solemn pomp of triumph used to go that way up into the Capitol. This as well as others was paved with flint stone. It went on hill to the back porch of S. Celsus, towards the plain field of Flora: and so forward to the temple sometime of Juno, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. Georges church in Velabrum. In the pontifical horse-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places: and namely, the prottirature and counterfet of Ninus, also of all sorts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tyber, with the yeelding her teats to be sucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows; the statue of Læocoon, whereof hath been spoken before, Capit hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those horse-yards.

The water Sabbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Agustillaria and afterwards when the conduct and conveyance thereof was by Hadrian restored, it was brought into the place of S. Peter, to serve the priests there.

In Vaticane plain, not far from the mount reared by Hadrian, there stood a Pyramis or steeple in times past, under which they say P. Scipio Africanus lay entered.

CHAP. XII.

The mount of Hadrianus, and the meadows called Quintia.

Ælius Hadrianus reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre neer the bridge Æliæ, over against the Mausoleum of Augustus. In which were bestowed first his own ashes, and afterwards the relics of all the Antonines. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The same also is called the tower of Crescentinus, because one Crescentinus, a famous captain, held it a long time. See more in Procopius.

The meadows Quintia in the plain Vaticane, took the name of Quintus Cincinnatus, Read Phny herof. Now they be called Aprata.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flumentana.

The first thing presented to our sight when we are out of the gate Flumentana is the port-way or cauley Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Cn. Flaminius brought along as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or peble without he laid it with gravel. And in that order be all the port-ways laid about Rome. Upon this way Angustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the cauley Cæsar had a stam or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Livy sheweth. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Horse-yards of Ovid.

The way Æmilia, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminius, leadeeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now two cauleys there were of that name, the one which met with Flaminia the other which Scævus laid and made, which went through Pisa and Luna to the Sabatii. In likemanner there was a way called Tyberina and Cælia, without the gate now called Avridaria, which passed along time by Sutrinum, Tuscanum, and Priestum into the way Vulturnensis. Certain places there be in the way Flaminia some what hollow and flat like saddles, called therefore Cistella.

Without the gate Collatina there is a cauley of the same name.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collina.

The port-way from the gate Collina is called Salaria, because the Sabines at it brought (as it is thought) the City. There upon stood the bridge Salaris. And it reached to Numentana. In it was the temple of Venus Erycina, vowed by Fabius the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Porcius. There stood also the image of Venus Verticordia, so called, for that she averted mens minds from wanton lust. Likewise the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally the monument or tomb of Lucius the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intragæres.

Without the gate Numentana, there beginneth a cauley of the same name, by which men go to Numentum. The same is called Figulinæ, of the potters furnaces there standing. The goddess Nevia, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with doleful plaints and lamentable moans, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like manner, other gods and goddesses, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the less harm: and namely, to the Fevers, to Mars the revenger, to Nemesis and such other. Upon this way Numentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridge Numentana, built by one Narsetes an Etruscan. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the country of [Panoctus] Nero, freedman, in which Nero killed himself. Without the gate Intragæres, was a tower or castle called Cæladia, where the souldiers of Dioctes kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Psarrium (now Psarriolum) to be seen, where divers wild beasts were kept, more for pleasure and delight, then profit and use.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those things that without the gates Esquilina, Navia, Calimontana, and Gabinia, either have been or now are.

From the gate Tiburina, there goeth a way of the same name leading to the City Tyber. Upon it there is a bridge Mamæ, commonly called Mamula and bearing the name of Mamæa, Alexander the Emperours mother, who repaired it. A place there is by it called Piscicola, of a multitude of pits there. Also the bridge Lucanæ, without the said gate standeth over the river Anio. And without the same gate, the two riverets called Anio the old and new do gather a current and run to Rome.

Without the gate Esquilina as waies Laticæna and Prænestina. In this way the water Appia hath his head and beginneth, which by Appius Claudius was brought into the City. The water Virgo likewise, which in time past was shewed by a maid to the souldiers, is the way, and from thence is conveyed to the City.

But the Roman waters see Frontinus, who describeth right excellently, the source and beginning the conveyance and earthing, the end also and use of every one of them.

At the end of the way Calimontana, beginneth another called Campana, which closeth with Latina. Between the gate Calimontana and Latina, standeth the gate Gabinia. From which there there went away some time called Gabinus leading to Gabii (due it runneth soon into Preneſtina for that the Gabians dwell upon it.

CHAP. XVII.

Of those things which were or are without the gates Latina and Capena.

The gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the cauley Latina, which through Leuclaeum, now called Val-montius, and Latium reacheth to Campania, in which there stood in old time, the temple of Venus-fortune, and the image of the same goddess. Of which writeth Plinius Max. In the said way the water Tepula gathereth to an heath and curven. From the gate Appia, beginneth a cauley of that name, paved by Ap. Claudius as far as to Capua, whereof look in Sirabo.

At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior, or Grandivus; and therein the kitchen of Mars. Hard by the same temple was the stone Manalis brought into the City of Rome in time of a drought, and presently there arose a shower of rain; whereupon he was called Manalis. In the way Capena, stood the oratory or chappell of Dea Bonae; and near to it, they say, that Claudian and Papirius were slain. Near to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the sacred grove of Honor, and the temples of Hope and Minerva. Likewile of Tempest, built by Marcellus. Moreover, another of Ridiculum; because Anibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and scorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridge Valentinus, built by the Emperor Valens, and thereupon, near the hill Maffica, standeth the town Stinella.

This way had certain notable sepulchres, namely of Collatinus, the Scipios, the Servilii, Metelli, Tullii, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horatii, and other. And in that part is to be seen the plain, whereupon the Horatii fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and well-spring, consecrated to Mercurie. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurel, and therewith besprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurie; that as many as had this aspersion and sprinkling, might be spoiled of their sinnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove also of Egeria was this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia; wherein S. Sebastian (by report) suffered: even in the very place where they used to solemnize the feast Terminalis, to the god of Meers and Bounds Terminus.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of those things that be without the gate Hofiensis, and others in generall.

From the gate Hofiensis beginneth the way Hofiensis which leadeth to Hofia, built by Anco. This was called in old time, the gate of the three twinned brethren, or Trigeminorum; and without it, Livy setteth the purse or merchants hall, Emporium.

In that part of the City on the other side of the water, were three gates, Portuensis, Aurelia, Fontinalis. At Portuensis, beginneth away of that name, and leadeth to the port town Ostia: where there was a temple of Portunus, the god of havens; and wherein the feast Portunalia was celebrated to the honour of that god.

From the gate Aurelia, the way also Aurelia taketh beginning; which along the sea-coast of Tuscia, leadeth to Pise. The same was called Trajana of Trajanus who repaired it: wherein wereth the hort-yards of Galba the Emperor; and there also was his sepulchre.

[At the gate Fontinalis, was the feast Fontinalis celebrated at Rome, namely, to the goddess of fountains, as saith Sext. Pompeius.

To the Reader.

For as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and howsoever otherwise willing enough to speak our language, yet most loth to forbeare and forget certain Roman words wherewith so long time he had been acquainted, also for that now & then he saith one in his English tongue and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought either to trip or to have forgotten himself, and the fault imputed to his teacher: in these regards (not thoughts) I loved him much for their sake and converse with English Livy, as to justify them in that behalf. A twofold task therefore I have digested: the one directing and leading readily to the most material and principal matters contained in the whole body of the History: the other expounding those things that may seem at first strange to the most; and with all, showing here and there the reason of the foresaid disagreement, hoping that as use will make them more familiar in those strange phrases: so deeper and farther conference with him in the primitive Latine (the only touchstone of his true speech) shall excuse and acquit me of just blame, who have endeavoured that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so eloquently by many degrees, yet as truly, as in Latine.

To the High and Mighty Princeſs, and his moſt
Gracious LADY,

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHs, VANDALS and the adjoining Provinces.

Madam,

I bath happily ſain out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in ſo great a Majeſty, have given me advantage of omitting one of thoſe two ſubjects which uſually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epiftles. For I have ſo many reaſons to declare why I preſent this Supplement to your Majeſty, that if I were forced likewise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accompliſh it without a long and tedious Epiftle. But now thoſe Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Neceſſity, ſeeing out of your Humanity you condeſcended to read the Work while it was in Compoſing, and by your Learning more fully underſtood, then I or any other could expound what was ſuperfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuſe the meanneſſe of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Deſign hath no more happily ſucceeded, (Let thoſe men pretend ſhortneſſe of time, multitude of buſineſſe or incommodities of ſickneſſe, who aim at other Glory beſides that of Obedience) it ſufficeth me, I am conſcious, that in writing this, I have obſerved the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVO's HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finiſhed this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paſſage, You were pleaſed (according to Your excellent and well known Goodneſſe) to expreſſe Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, ſo to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein Your maniſeſt both your Wiſdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was ſolely intended for your own ſervice, you were willing ſhould be uſeful unto all: Your Wiſdom in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exerciſe their Wit and Induſtry in publishing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they ſhall have underſtood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpoliſhed Piece of mine. When therefore I ſee not only thoſe who are born unto your ſervice, but many alſo of ſtrange Nations moſt willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongſt a few of your moſt Faithful and neareſt ſubjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majeſty? I am indeed His who

The Epistle Dedicatory.

who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attend God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deserts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happily not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and lessen your Favours, then willingly bear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to their Dignity set forth much less being streightned within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majestie; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish; we then againa fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilst I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, inasmuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countreie: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare the

The Epistle Dedicatory.

the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest Error and blindness of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only. It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by GUSTAVUS the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your self, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessity of War, You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perplexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperities, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourish, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-ways, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Country-men of Germany happy who shall hereafter rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no sign surer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eyes by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatness of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy there remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolix in the Commemoration of your benefits bestowed.

The Epistle Dedicatory.

bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Moniments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this business. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto perswading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it self: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idleness, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from my infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benediſt Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetness of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm, upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Ubsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance, You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princeesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Ubsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, caused them to be esteemed small ones: For when you desired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral Wisdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructor therein, being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging War, often holding Parliaments, every day Councils, and constantly distracted with other business) you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that little wanting my help, you could hastily Translate him into Elegant Latine in most significant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped so great and various fruits of purest pleasure, as I could not but often ingenuously confesse to my most intimate acquaintance, That whatsoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care I (any) I thought all abundantly recompensed with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and countenanced by You, to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happinesse seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off these my worldly Accomtrements, as knowing I must one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happinesse have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments I learnt in time to know that so great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this so derable, I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am so free that I am not employed and wearied in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulness: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly loosing time or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity. Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse; whatsoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confesse the employment on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have bestowed on my Person; it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Intercession: In this confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy to my selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being too facile in granting what is requested. To these I shall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodnesse, which hath far exceeded my Deserts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never desired any thing but what was Just and Equal; nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things than to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermitt. This I shall say, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favours bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price, the others did more manifest your Humaneitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Philosopher asked of him a Groat, said, It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked a Talent, said, It was too much for a Philosopher to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive; in the greater, what became Your self to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak, both for the Greatnesse of the Thing, and for the Greatnesse of the Thanks due, which cannot at present be expressed. But I may happily be accused of Flattery, if I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Praise, than by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes; by which benefit I believe the City was preserved, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majesty as a second Foundress. You have hereby for ever obliged the Commonwealth of the Vangiones; and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know that who of Right oweth most to you; they who received the benefit or he who procured it at your Hands! Is there any thing can be equalled to, or preferred before what I have already said? Yes surely, even this; In that you have promised to make me a better man; not as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners; nor, as many, by Example; but, as yet none, by your care and Diligence in Communicating with me: For you have promised to make Bliss with me (that is to direct and show me) how Wise and Prudent men ought to be qualified; and by what stones they may be discovered; which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better than now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majesty from your Obligation for half your Kingdom. And I shall not refuse, whensoever You Command, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will, I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach, than do indeed truly know and understand it. In this thing I may well boast whereby I am more happy, not only than ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person, which he did not ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admonisheth me to make an end. I shall therefore now be silent, humbly adoring Your Majesty, and giving You to understand, That not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majesty, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affections thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your sake simply willing to do any thing whatsoever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

THE SUPPLEMENT OF LIVIE'S HISTORY

By J. FREINSHEMIUS.

THE FIRST BOOK

In place of LIVIE'S XIth Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

THE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his spirits. Therefore Q. Fabius the Consul, in the year now in the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marcheth into the neighbourhood of his Army into Campania. For the Samnites being an hardy people, and by all their overthrows brought rather into Delpir than Fear, while the former Consuls carried back the Legions to Rome; attending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consuls were men not much to be feared, either for any experience in Marshal affairs, or for any great Authority they had, they grew confident, invaded, depopulated, and waited the Territories of the Campanians whom Livie Book 7 gers and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabian-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite Scouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole Host, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all haste that may be the Battle to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspect, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souldiers with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder than to fight. Three thousand of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of a favourable place, as well as in such a Conternation may be expected, they fortified their Camp, where there was little better comfort or confidence than in the field, the weary had no convenience of rest, the Hungry wanted food, and the Wounded had no application of Medicines, for issuing out with their weapons only, they had left all their carriage and baggage in the former Camp.

event of things, they thought fit to obey the Gods who would themselves open a way for their fortunes to proceed by. A very strange thing then fell out, but of most undoubted truth, by reason of the sincerity of so many Authors affirming it, as likewise appears by the structure of the Chappel in Tibur then erected and consecrated; When the Roman Embassadors had delivered their Message, the Epidaurians entertain'd them kindly, but because it did not appear what was convenient to be granted them, they were conducted to the Temple with liberty to convey away what should seem convenient for their use. The Altars of this God among the Græcians was most commonly in open and high Places; the Epidaurians also five miles from their City had a Temple of greatest Fame in those days, and very rich by the gifts of men who believed their health to proceed from thence. Being brought thither, while they stand in admiration; Behold an huge Serpent creeping out of a secret place fills all their minds with horror and Devotion: For the Priests with great veneration cried out, The God himself is in this Snake, and being sometimes seen in this shape, it always imports a good and healthful Omen. Two days was he seen in the Temple and then again withdrew himself; the third day through the midst of the throng of Spectators and Adorers he went directly to the Port where the Roman vessel attended them; and entering into the Ship he rolls himself up according to his spiral manner, in the Cabin of Q. Ogulnius President of the Embassy. There is an ancient story that the same Æsculapius having assumed the form of a Serpent was carried from Epidaurus to Sigyon by a Yoke of Mules, one Nicagora, the wife of Ecetimus driving the wain.

The Romans rejoicing at the good Omen, as having the God himself present among them, hoisted sail, and in a few days with a prosperous Voyage, crossed the Seas and arrived at Antium; where the Sea being troublesome, and their navigations hindered, the serpent which had kept itself still and quiet all the voyage, creeping out the Ship, glided to the Porch of the most eminent Church in that City, and there abode three whole days together: The Romans much fearing they should never draw him from thence, seeing he had not in so long time returned to his wonted sustenance; but at length having regained him with much cheerfulness they conveyed him to Rome: The whole City ran out to the sight of so incredible a wonder; on the banks of the river as he passed by many altars were erected, incense and sweet odours prepared, and sacrifices slain. They were now just come to that place, where Tiber a little dividing itself, suffereth an Island to appear in the midst of it; when the Serpent forsaking the Ship betakes himself into that Island by swimming, and was not afterwards any more seen by man; hence was the place call'd the Island of Æsculapius. The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple to be there erected to Æsculapius. The sickness whether by this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly enriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its renown wonderfully spread abroad by those who profert to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumius the Consul carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercis'd against his Colleague at home: For whereas Q. Fabius Gurges, the last years Consul, did by order from the Senate manage affairs in Saminius as Proconsul; Posthumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart the Province, in as much as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabius answering with the Decree of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to desert a business imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared lest by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be dammified: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to send Legates to the Consul, to desire in the Senates name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue with the Army in Saminius. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; added withal a speech of singular impudence: That during his Consulship, he was not obliged to obey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he marcht with his Army to Cominium, which City Fabius did then besiege, relolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Army had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had resistd with the same he was assaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profess'd that he yielded not to the Consulship, but to the good of the Commonwealth. Posthumius in a few days reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Venusia, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were slain, six thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yielding themselves to the mercy of the conquerours. The Consuls achievements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters advise the Fathers that the City and Territory of Venusia was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thousand men; for so I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceeding belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet unsubdued they should ingratify placing a considerable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Luticians. Now the stubbornness of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contracted him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabius his Favour and good opinion with with all men, so, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily assented unto. Being now Proconsul he did on the Calends of April make his triumph over those Saminites who are called Penri: He old Fabius followed his Chariot on horse-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not upon the peoples Consul, using himself as the name, so the modesty of a Legate; beholding his honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one, he did in his own triumph diers, the rest laid up in the Treasury; and C. Pontius the Samnite being first led in Triumph afterward beheaded: A stout man he was and of worthy memory, who in those days did a most shameful one at the Caudine Spinnies: He was reported to say, That had he been reserved to those days wherein the Romans should have learn't to receive money, he would no longer have served them to bear sway. It seems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by itself in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Posthumius fretting no of mind opposing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exasperate the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those objections against him, by weakness of speech and carriage to have been asswaged. He abtained not from complaints against his enemies, nor from reproaches against the Senate, and to spite the Fathers, he debilitated the triumph likewise contrary to the pleasure of the Senate, which, though some refer to his second Consulship, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is so affirmed by authors of no mean credit in Histories: By these doings he drew new hatred upon himself, and he was no sooner out of office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a set day accused him: Of the City, he employed two thousand choice men out of his Legions to dig up a piece of ground, and detained them many days in this work, not remembering they were his soldiers, not his slaves, and were leaved to enlarge the Publick's Land, not to manure his. Being earnestly press'd with these Crimes, and in vain striving to clear himself, he was by the suffrage of all the Tribes condemned; his life was valued to stand him in two hundred thousand pieces of money. Now P. Cornelius set batels having the upper hand compelled them, and ruining their Cities, and in many batels lost the prime of their Youth; and in Pontius the chief counsel and conduct, for having in so Engravius B. 2. now this fourth time a League might be renewed with them. 'Tis likely too the Romans even weary with beating, were willing to conclude a difficult and miserable War, with the tranquility of a certain peace. I find the war with the Saminites to have begun when M. Valerius was the third time Consul, A. Cornelius Cossus being his Colleague, and being through four and fifty Consulships, with various success continued (only by some short liv'd truces suspended) it held both parties in play with much trouble and vexation; whether Cornelius triumphed for this War is uncertain; as for Manius there is no doubt, for his fortune being more eminent in that Nation, now grown wealthy with a long peace, whether they were moved with their own property put their young men into Arms, invaded some places under the Roman Jurisdiction: Against their territories with instruction, that spreading themselves as much as could be, bringing terror and vastation on every place: This straight did soon dissolve the formidable Army of the Saminites, several troops running several ways to the defence of their own subsistence; so that the Adriatick Sea, gaining the possession of so much ground, and so many men, as the far ready in deeds then in words) when he could not express every singular circumstance, in gross ex-Ant. de viris pressed himself, That he had taken so much ground, it must needs have turned into wilderness, but necessity have perished with hunger; and that he had taken so many men, they must of ground. Florus B. 1. c. 33. When the Sabinus fled for peace, not only that was afforded them, but likewise the Freedom of the City, (though without the suffrage of the Tribes) this favour v. s. in memory of their old Affinity under Tatius, the late War not being carried on with any malignant hatred. Of the next years Consulship (underwent by M. Valerius Corvinus, and Q. Cædicius Nottus) we have decision of the arrived to little understanding; only I find some Colonies about this time deduced to Castrum, City 664. Ad. i. (from whence the Sea taketh its name) and to Sena in Gallia: Nevertheless consider-Florus ing those Regions were not as yet to such a purpose sufficiently settled, I think fit rather to encline to other Authors who refer the beginning of those Colonies to after-times: But in the City for restraining many villanies and outrages daily committed, there was a new Magistracy constituted under the name of Capital Triumvirs, who were appointed Judges and Moderators to take cognizance of offences, to imprison the guilty, and, when occasion was, to inflict punishments.

The words of the Law in that case made by L. Papius, Tribune of the people, I find to be these, whosoever shall hereafter be Prator to give Judgment among the Citizens, let him require of the people three Capital men, and those three men, whoever shall be chosen, let them exact oaths, let them judge, let them be of equal authority, as by the Laws and decrees of the people they ought to Exact, to Judge, and to Be. In which clause commission is likewise given of requiring Mults or Fines, for in those days that piece of money which was disbursed by way of punishment, was called a Sacrament, because (the public sacrifices being many, and the Treasury but low) it was destin'd to be expended in sacrifices.

Of the Taxes that year, there is no other memory left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand Citizens were rated. That this years Censors did likewise choose Q. Fabius Maximus Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambustus his father, and transmitted it to his son Gurgus. While affairs were in a good state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Commonalty being far in debt required a general discharge by public authority for all debts and bonds passed aforesaid, without any satisfaction; this was an old device, and for two hundred years and upwards variously agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Extortion of Usurers move their indignation. Under the former Consuls, the fear either of the Pettulance or the Enemy did smother these contentions in some measure; but Q. Marcus Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina being Consuls, and the year ensuing M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Nautilus Rutilus bearing office, they broke out most violently, for the appeasing whereof, more then for any other occasion, a Dictator was created, whom I take to be Appius Claudius, who was afterwards surnamed Cacilius, in as much as among ancient monuments I find him to have been Dictator.

Besides the harshness of unconformable usury, the villanous lust of C. Plautius added fire to the peoples minds now already hotly disposed, causing them the sooner and more vehemently to break out into flame. T. Veturius (the son of that Veturius who being Consul was delivered up to the Samnites for an unworthy League made with them) by reason of his domestic calamities, overcharged with debt and not able to pay, was forced to yield himself slave to Plautius, patiently performing all servile duties. Plautius not content to have reduced to this base condition a young man of excellent Beauty, of a Consular Family, and likewise of great hopes, did moreover attempt to corrupt his Chastity, having before deprived him both of Estate and Liberty.

But Veturius disdaining and resolving to suffer any thing rather then commit so horrid a wickedness, was with most grievous stripes tormented, whereupon he thrust himself forth into the publick, and being by the multitude conducted to the Consul's Tribunal, he complains of the cruelty and lust of his Creditor, shewing withal the bunches and fresh marks of the lashes. The Consuls therefore judging it a business not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence past, Plautius was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whosoever through the whole City had bound themselves slaves for debt, were set at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Veturius some Authors make mention of Publius the son of a Colonel, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the Usurers growing to hard-hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debtors (refusing nothing in the midst of their penurie) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they should be admonished by so fresh an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future. But the people desiring to be freed not only from their Indentures, but from the Extortion of Use money, were not satisfied with that Law though favourable to their revengeful minds. And (as in some more acute diseases, the pain is rather intended by a gentle application of medicines then remitted) not long after the matter was so Exacerbated, that when the Tribunes of the people with their greatest endeavours contended for a Law concerning Letters of Protection from Creditors, and that the Creditors did with equal force and animosity resist: The Commonalty after the example of their Ancestors, quitting the City, retired cross the water to Mount Janiculus, resolving never, without obtaining their request, to return to their own household-Gods. The Consuls finding little remedy against this combustion (M. Valerius Potius, and C. Aelius Paterius are thought then to be Consuls) they were fain to flee to the last refuge in distressed times, and create a Dictator, who was Q. Hortensius; he applying what the Time and the Cause seemed to require, and understanding the main breach of peace to consist in this, That the people were sensible of the violation of their Decrees, and the Publilian Law, thought fit to yield to the times, (though many strove against this opinion) and by a new Law made in the Eclipte, he diligently provided, That whatsoever the Commonalty should ordain, all the Romans should be obliged unto. With these Lenitives the people being reduc'd to concord, and returned to their own houses, the Dictator, either by the sudden force of his disease, or overwearied with care and pains, dyed during the time of his Magistracy, which had hapned to none before. Henceforward for a while there was less dissention at Rome; but the Dignity of the Empire began insensibly to decrease, in as much as the Commons not being guarded against the fraudulent proceedings of Ambitious men, and yet earnest to manifest their authority, accepted of any feeling the vulgar, if their own private business proceed fairly, seldom meddle with things of an higher nature, not to provoke them by injuries and oppressions of great ones to strive to a Dominion they know not how to manage. About this time I believe was the Law made concerning susterages, that the Fathers, to the danger of their own Courts, were fain to authorise the Senate assented thereunto.

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they seldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were always feared as having power to do so. But then Maximius the Tribune made a Law whereby the peoples Authority was much augmented, but the whole Rome, and honourable severity of the Senate much weakened. Q. Hortensius the Dictator being dead, some report another was chosen to administer, C. F. C. N. is said to have been Master of his horse. For there was war at this time with the Volscians of the Etruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the sedition found of waging war with the Lucanians, who being troublesome neighbours, had by many injuries compelled the Thurines (a City of that part of Italy called Great Greece) to betake themselves to the Roman Protection: And C. Aelius the Tribune propounding a War against the Lucanians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is the Consuls of C. Aelius Canina, and M. Aemilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity; only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Curius concerning the Lucanians, which is to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But in what year, or illustrious

But things of greater weight were now ingendering, which were attended with a very considerable slaughter, for a war was now arisen against the Senones a people of Gallia. They had often warre and often peace with the Romans; and now, after their last overthrow in the fields of Sentinas, where Decius having Devoted himselfe to Death, a great Number of the men were slain, had lien still for almost ten years; Only they had suffer'd their young men to be hired by the Etruscans against the Romans. But now marching into Etruria, with a greater power then they had usually done, they Besieged Arretium. Now the Arretines, with a Truce, whose Terme was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of success consist, because the Romans alwayes thought it mainly concern'd them to have the Arretines beaten. Wherefore sending Embassadors to Rome they craved assistance against the common enemy. In the mean time the year was gone about wherein C. Servilius Tucca and Lucius Cassius Metellus were Consuls, in stead of Cassius some annals mention Calpurnius. But the lesser Nobility of the Calpurnian family is thought not to have attained the Consular dignity till the year from the foundation of the City six hundred and sixtie.

But now marching into Etruria, with a greater power then they had usually done, they Besieged Arretium. Now the Arretines, with a Truce, whose Terme was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of success consist, because the Romans alwayes thought it mainly concern'd them to have the Arretines beaten. Wherefore sending Embassadors to Rome they craved assistance against the common enemy. In the mean time the year was gone about wherein C. Servilius Tucca and Lucius Cassius Metellus were Consuls, in stead of Cassius some annals mention Calpurnius. But the lesser Nobility of the Calpurnian family is thought not to have attained the Consular dignity till the year from the foundation of the City six hundred and sixtie.

care and pains, dyed during the time of his Magistracy, which had hapned to none before. Henceforward for a while there was less dissention at Rome; but the Dignity of the Empire began insensibly to decrease, in as much as the Commons not being guarded against the fraudulent proceedings of Ambitious men, and yet earnest to manifest their authority, accepted of any feeling the vulgar, if their own private business proceed fairly, seldom meddle with things of an higher nature, not to provoke them by injuries and oppressions of great ones to strive to a Dominion they know not how to manage. About this time I believe was the Law made concerning susterages, that the Fathers, to the danger of their own Courts, were fain to authorise the Senate assented thereunto.

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they seldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were always feared as having power to do so. But then Maximius the Tribune made a Law whereby the peoples Authority was much augmented, but the whole Rome, and honourable severity of the Senate much weakened. Q. Hortensius the Dictator being dead, some report another was chosen to administer, C. F. C. N. is said to have been Master of his horse. For there was war at this time with the Volscians of the Etruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the sedition found of waging war with the Lucanians, who being troublesome neighbours, had by many injuries compelled the Thurines (a City of that part of Italy called Great Greece) to betake themselves to the Roman Protection: And C. Aelius the Tribune propounding a War against the Lucanians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is the Consuls of C. Aelius Canina, and M. Aemilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity; only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Curius concerning the Lucanians, which is to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But in what year, or illustrious

BOOK II.

P Cornelius Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius Calvinius being Consuls, when the Terrour of the Callique warre began again to move it selfe, and news was brought that many of the Tuscans had joynd forces with the Senones, the Fathers thought the Danger of the Aretines a thing not to be neglected by them: And because they could neither recall Dolabella from the Volscians, nor Domitius out of Lucania without great hindrance to their affaires, The Fathers ordain L. Cæcilius Metellus the last yeares Consul, and now Prætor, with all haste to Leavy an Army, and raise the siege of Aretium; Nevertheless left the warre should seeme to be rashly undertaken, they thought fit to send Embassadors before, to Declare that Aretium was under the Roman Protection, and that the Gauls being in League With them would do more justly, if they would not lead their Army against their Friends and Companions. The message being proclaim'd among the Senones, Britomaris a fierce young man of the Royall Blood, whose Father had been slain by the Romans amongst the Etrurian auxiliaries, burning with desire of Revenge, caused not only the men, but the Ensignes of their sacred Office to be hewne and torne in Pieces. The Rumour of so horrid a fact being related in Rome and in the Camp of Dolabella, their mindes were vehemently incensed, and warre proclaim'd against the Senones; and Dolabella forthwith leaving the Etrurians, marcheth with his Army through the Sabines, and Picenians territories with very long Journies into the Countrey of the Senones, who terrified with this sudden Invasion, now in the absence of their main strength, taking the field with a small and inconsiderable body were easily routed and overcome. The Consul giving the Enemy no Breath, Burnes up his Townes, demolisheth his Buildings, wasteth the whole land, and having slain the youth and carried away the weaker multitude of Women and Children, left very little signe that ever that Countrey had been inhabited by Mankind. Britomaris himselfe being taken and punished with various and exquisite Torments was referred for the Triumph. At the same time things succeeded not so prosperously at Aretium; For L. Cæcilius Metellus had ill fortune in his fight before the Town with the Senones and Etrurians, seven Colonells with many other men of Note, together with the Prætor himself were slain, and of their Legions and Auxiliaries about Thirteen Thousand were wanting.

But the Joy for this victory prevailed not so much with the Gauls, as sorrow and Conster-nation for the Lamentable Desolation of their Countrey; Wherefore gathering together all their Countrey men then in Armes in Etruria, full of Grief and Anger, void of counsell and hope, having no habitation whereto to be received at home, (I know not what Fate drawing them to their destruction) in a heat of Resolution they drive toward Rome, thus Computing, That there is nothing may to recompence the desolation of their own Countrey, but by forcing the Romans to see the like Ruine of their City; That their Spirits and Forces were now no whit inferior to, nor the cause of their March from Aretium of less importance, then that of their Ancestours who marched from Clusium of the same Etruria and took Rome: With the like speeches incensing themselves they Rush on, by nature impatient of Delay, and now hally in their Countells, that they might overwhelm their Enemies unawares; But travelling through an Enemies Countrey, they met with many obstacles, so that the Romans had Leisure to provide against this Fury. At length wandering through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Consul, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy rashness confounded both their Reason and Discipline: many being slain in Battel, the Residue growing mad with Rage and despair sheathed in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn against the Enemy. Infomuch as so sudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murdering Embassadors, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be numbred among Nations, whose laws they had violated and Transgressed: For even the small Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kinsmen the Baii, were the next year by Dolabella the Consul with an universal slaughter clean swept away. For whereas the Boians and Etrurians were involv'd in these late disasters, and possessed with fear of the same Calamities they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a set Battell overcome, many of the Etrurians slain, few of the Boians escaped, the very name of the Senones so utterly extinct, that that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had let Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans having now an entire possession of their Countrey, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Thence was I believe by Q. Æmilius Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabricius his first Consulship hapned that year, and 'tis certain the Province of Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in most Annals yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Intervening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by so many continual fights and victories very mightily encreased their Virtue and Power, all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, conspired in a great and most dangerous warre; joining together they fit any longer to deferre their Designe, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurian League and openly joining force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But when they joynd battell near the City of the Thurines, which Statius Silvestus had againe likewise forced and taken. It is reported that while the camp was strenuously defended, a Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thousand are said to be slain in the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Prisoners, and twenty-eight and promising a CORONA VALLARIS to him who first entered the Enemies Camp. After diligent Enquiry made after the man, the fouldier was not to be found (if so be he were a fouldier) who would claime this Honour; 'Twas therefore believed and voiced abroad that Mars was the Author of this feat, and the Cause of Victory. And by the Consul's order supplication was made unto him, which the fouldiers with Laurelle on their heads performed with great Joy and Gladness. The Tarentines had not as yet assidied the Accomplish with any open aid, for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wiser to let their own. But this Diffimulation served not their purpose, for a meer accident provoking the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Græcians (by whom Tarentum and most of the Tarentines above others were most Luxurious in this kind, inasmuch as it is said they had more Feasts and Solemn Playes then Dayes in the Year. It hapned they were then set at their sports in the greater Theatre by the Haven side, when L. Valerius (some say Cornelius) one of the Admiralls of the seas was decryed entering the Haven with ten Roman Veffels; A Fatal Error to both Parties; For the Romans ignorant of all things betook themselves thither as to a friendly and amicable shore; the Tarentines on the other side Conscious of their own privacy practises interpreted this Navy to be sent with an hostile Intention. There was then present one Philtecharis whom for his loose Conversation the Citizens call'd Thais; He mentioning articles of some former Leagues, said it was not lawful for the Romans to saile past the Promontory of Luciniam, that therefore they should go out and meet the foot-hardy Barbarians, manifest their assent by Acclamation, so that one scandalous persons opinion in a matter of so great importance was generally received, and without further Consideration they take up-terly unprepar'd to fight, betook themselves to flight. The Tarentines swiftly pursuing, whereof Four with the Admirall were drown'd and one taken; The Men, as many were of Apollonia age and strength fit for Warre, were slaine, the rest made slaves. Presently with the same vanity they wage warre against the Thurines, accusing them, That the Romans came into these parts by their means, who though they were Græcians, had yet in the time of their distresses sent a Barbarous Nation to be their Protector; rather then the Tarentines their Neighbors and Kinsmen. The City is taken and plundered, the Chief men cast out and banish'd, and the Roman Garrison compounding for their own safety are dismissed. The Romans hearing the News, were according to the Greatness of the Injury most exceedingly incens'd, yet thought it not convenient at that season to undertake a new warre: An Embassy was decreed to complain of the Outrage, and infrustration was given the Legates to Require, That the Captives should be set at Liberty, the Thurines goods or the just value of them should be restor'd, the Cities call'd back, and the Authors of these Misdemeanours deliver'd into the hands of the Romans. The Tarentines according to the Greeke Custome were wont to assemble their People together in the Theatre; whether the Embassadors being with much Difficulty admitted, they find a Rabble-roue totally debauch'd with Drunkenness and Idleness, for this likewise was a great Holiday with the Tarentines. There when L. Postumius the Prince Legate began to declare his Message message, he was entertained with such mocks and scoffs of the wanton multitude, that he carried home greater causes of hatred than he came to complain of. For they had him in such contempt, that not regarding any thing else he spoke, when, as being a Roman, he chanced to pronounce any word not so exactly according to the Greek manner, the whole company would burst out into laughter, crying out upon him and reviling him as a Barbarian, they jeer'd and flouted at the Habit of the Embassadors, for they came in their gowns, and at last fairly thrust them out of doors, in vain claiming the privilege of the Laws of Nations. Now, what is scarce fit to be spoken, but may prove of good example to curb the insolence of popular license, it is reported, That as the Embassadors pressed through the crowd of the Tarentines out of the Theatre, a certain Buffoon, one Philonides (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to their good manners, the Names of their Jefters were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, piss'd upon the sacred Vestments of the Embassadors. This might seem the crime of one only mad furious fellow, but that forthwith the whole drunken society did own it, and the whole Theatre resounded with laughter, and clappings of the hands, as approving the fact. Posthumus lifting up his voice, We accept this, O men, O Jester (saith he) seeing ye bestow these things upon us we require not at your hands. And when he returned himself to the multitude throwing his defiled garment, they renew'd their laughter, and began to dance, singing (scurrilous and reproachful) Verses against the people of Rome, wherefore Posthumus again crying out, Laugh on, saith he, laugh on, Tarentines, while ye may, for hereafter ye shall weep sufficiently: Whereat the Tarentines being nettled, Nay, saith he, to vex you the more, I tell you before hand, this garment shall cost you much blood the washing. After this, receiving no other answer, they failed home. Now at Rome, L. Aemilius Barbula, and Q. Marcus Philippus, had begun their Consulship, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robe defiled, as it was, being shew'd by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to send an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many days even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprized before the other Cities, at least those near Tarentus were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbing their votes, it was decreed, That the business of the Tarentine war should be refer'd to the people.

The people with an unanimous consent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were sent to Aemilius the Consul, who was then gone to the Army into Samnium, That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and bold war. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men, but a just and well order'd Army, rousing themselves out of their accustomed slothfulness, began ferociously to enter into council, what was to be done, to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in satisfaction was base, and to avoid both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, Why do we thus, O Tarentines, wait the time in vain alterations? the times are come which require Deeds rather than Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and sincere Counsel. Neither am I much moved that heretofore, by a strange disease incident to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and sugar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is sufficient to instruct us to prefer what is Profitable before what is Pleasing. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to hit you in the teeth with past misdemeanors; for unfeasonably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly insults over others infirmities: And an honest man that is careful of the common safety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unless the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to fall at the same stone, and not to grow wiser when the very event plainly castigeth our rashness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning assaulted and drown'd the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinsmen the Thurines, because they had rather be protected by the Romans, than swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; moreover, we have suffered shameful indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in that most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch'd in our fields, and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it be safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying aside all self flattery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we might freely and truly consult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say factions, not taking counsel out of judgment or as the state of things require, but every man byassed by his own inclination. For how comes it to pass that so few of the young men, and poorer sort stand for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men desire war? what other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but these that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Urinary, the other in time of war, hope for command and liberty of plunder? This is an old disease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commodity to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must speak what I think at present most conducive) if ye will neither buy peace on such base conditions as shall infringe the privileges of a Free City, nor yet trust singly to your own Forces in so difficult a war. Our Ancestors have often committed the conduct and command of their Armies to foreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnesus or out of Sicilie we have sent for Archidamus the son of Agessilaus, afterward for Chironius, then presently for Agathocles. Even in our own memory when we were infested by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously, but left things in a flourishing condition to us. There is at this day the same friendship between us and the Epirots, neither are they now less potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrhus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we assisted him in his attempt against the Corcyrans. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel, Paulus, but as the counsel of the wisest men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which ye ought therefore at least to follow, because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the issue and success of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the same purpose: There is no man amongst us so singularly eminent, to whom all the rest will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And whosoever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to say, that 'tis not safe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, a hardy stout Nation and inured to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrhus is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Martial affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Certainly, being a man desirous of action, and having no other war at present, he will not only come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water soldiers. And if ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on such conditions as or below a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the least of my hopes, that the Romans will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms than admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much less glory and renown out of the same Epirus. This counsel likewise the assembly being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimously concur in this, as seeming indifferent to both sides.

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the City, that a decree was made for the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meton a covetous fellow, taking a dry wither'd chaplapper upon his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his mistle, entered the Theatre; the people according to their idle custom, commanded him to sing and his woman to pipe, after a peevish silence being made, Meton cries out, To do well, O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to sing and Dance; for when Pyrrhus once comes into the City no saying, and murmurings and whisperings arising: Those who were authors of the injuries against the Romans (fearing lest if peaceful Councils prevailed they should be delivered up to punishment) having chid the people, That they would suffer themselves to be unworthily decided by a rash fellow, forcibly thrust Meton out of the Theatre; so that afterward without contradicting to peace, and understanding that Embassadors were sent with presents to Pyrrhus, some by composition, and fills all places with loss, and terror. The Tarentines fend forth forces to hinder the Spoile, but, after a sharp conflict, the Romans having the better, the Gracians are driven back into the City with great loss. Then Aemilius without reluctance walleth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarentines terrified with these calamities (like a people, the more insolent in prosperity, the more dejected and fearful in adversity) submit themselves to the Government of Agus, who was a coultant author of maintaining the Roman friendship. Their desire and hopes of peace were much augmented by the discourse of diligence and candour he entertain'd those who were taken in several places of the Countrey, or in changed their minds, and erected their Spirits. For Pyrrhus being a man of vast conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accomplish all his designs, as if the Fates themselves had invited him.

all the Italians. In the utmost part of the Italian shore over against Sicily is seated the City of Rhegium, (by a Græcian name so called) very wealthy and flourishing in those days: The Citizens thereof judging by the Arrival of Pyrrhus that a great and terrible warre would ensue, and frighted likewise with the Carthaginian Navy floating up and down in those seas, not trusting in their own strength, thought fit to send for a Guard from Rome. The Romans sent them Four thousand soldiers (which being leaved out of the Colonies of Campania, were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the Conduct of Decius Subellius their Colonel; These at their first coming were very faithful, and very diligent in defending the City. At length seeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleness and imitation of the Greek Customs, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetousness and Envy did frequently discourse in all their meetings and quarters of the convenient situation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decius was well pleas'd with this, who being himself grown a Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward desire of seizing upon the City. The design was favour'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans that they had no Leisure to mind the affairs of Rhegium; Besides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the same Common Country; For they likewise were of Campania, and of late years going to warre amongst the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Messenians as Friends, having slain and call'd out the Citizens, possess'd the place themselves: sharing likewise among themselves their houses, wives and Estates. They call'd to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capua from the Tuscans. When they had now agreed upon the Business, there was nothing left to be consulted on, but only the Manner, how safely to execute their Design, left in so populous a City, the lesser number should be surrounded and slain by the greater. Decius counterfeitteth Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him; these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the soldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousness of the Rhegians; and some soldiers being suborned to it, cry out, 'Twas time to provide for their own safety by the sword, and turn that Destruction which was destin'd to them, upon the heads of the Authors, and as the business was set, a Messenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was seen by the shore, and secret discourses were had between him and the Rhegians. The soldiers now beside their former Covetousness, were much incited with the Treachery of the Enemy, and fear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Consent resolv'd upon, That as the Townsmen shall be oppress'd unawares and unprepared, that having slain the Men, all the Publick and Private wealth of the City shall be distributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited some of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hospitality, takes away their Lives; others were every where slain in their own houses; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murdered, the rest were banish'd their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for preservation of themselves and their Country. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affairs; the houses and Estates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murderers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it selfe the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium: But it hath pleas'd God well to provide for Mankind, that such rare examples of high Mischiefe should prove likewise as manifest Examples of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Let us should onely by consideration of the success beanimated to the like Villany, and not by the Issue and event be deterr'd from evil doing, so that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madnes then for any man to perswade himself that he can grow happy by doing Mischiefe: For suppose there were no Punishment after Death, which all wise men acknowledge to be the greatest, (for the folly of ordinary men is so great they will scarce believe what is before their eyes, much less be moved with the terror of things unseen and afarre off,) yet let all things as to outward things succeed prosperously, nevertheless the Conscience of offences committed doth by secret wounds continually lacerate and torment the minde: the Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Detestation among men: and what is by ill means gotten, and with care and labour preserved is most commonly to their great grief snacht away again, neither God nor men suffering Wickedness to go long unpunished it will not be amiss briefly to relate the punishment of Decius Subellius, and his mad Accomplishes, as in these dayes it befall, for their Final destruction after great variety of troublesome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as shall in fit time be declared. These Rascalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves; The feare of the Romans and Pyrrhus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Conjunction of Affaires, so by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and resolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought safest in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, should have time to strengthen, compact and knit it selfe well together: they law that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the

the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of dissension, as is usual among Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decius in the sedition was call'd out and betook himself to Messana, the soldiers at Rhegium chose M. Cassius his Secretary for their Commander, and Decius carrying with him a great bank of money, was honour'd with the same dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither prosperous nor of continuance: For it hapned, that being troubled with sore eyes, he caus'd some Eminent Physician to be sought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp birth a Rhegium, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decius, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewise to He being mindfull of his Country and resolving now to be revenged for its Calamities, permitt certain efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Cantharides, and giving order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he takerh ship, and flyeth from Messana. Decius being along time sufficiently tormented with incredible paines, seeing his Physician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being wash'd off, he perceiv'd himself to be stark blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and dispis'd, he is reserv'd to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines, whom he had trusted his health, even as he himselfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. This fit such Examples as these should be recorded in History and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre these Cunning practises are different from wisdom and right reason; so that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honesty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of false and onely seeming good things by foul and villanous lusts involve themselves in true Evils.

OW at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a reserve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Consuls, P. Lævinus and Lævinus were committed to the charge of the new Consuls, P. T. Cornelianus sent to finish the Etrurian War. Lævinus, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, so to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Castle in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, did tard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treachery was feared, lest they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman strength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the business and gain time, he sent a Messenger with Letters of these Contents: Pyrrhus the King wishes Health to Lævinus, and desires that there are come forth forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with a small Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Lavinus answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversies, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou seem'st to do very absurdly in assuming to thyself the Judgment of other mens Causes, who art thy self guilty of a Crime, and hast not as yet received due punishment for entering Italy without our consent. Know then, that I come no less against thee than the Tarentines, to try our Right and Title with a just army, by the Judgment of Mars the Author and Founder of our Nation. And without delay moving his Ensignes, he sits down between the Cities of Pandosia and Heraclea, in a Champaign ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirins.

It is reported that Pyrrhus, walking down to the River side to view the Roman campe, when he had well and diligently consider'd it, said to one of his friends, Megacles by name, These Barbarians have martial'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee shall soon try what metall they are of. Then having placed strong guards upon the bankes, to hinder their Passage through the Fordes, he resolv'd to expect the coming of his Companions; not onely for the Reason of War, hoping the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and confidence of Lavinus; whose admiration was by a new Testimonia encreas'd with him, in that he had freely without punishment dismissed those spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger then this. In the mean time the Campe being so neer, there were many Pickereings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance. Almost fifty dayes being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the same reasons to hasten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, assembling his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions, and encourag'd them against the fear of a new enemy, extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all assays, he resolves either to fight the enemy by Consent, or compel him to Battell. Therefore seeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he sendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrage the Country, himself with his Legions in Battell Array, expecting till the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse fetching a compals far from the Camps, cross the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies stations on that side the River: The Epirots terrified with their sudden approach, betook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemy was so neer, marcheth in all haste to the River with his whole body of horse, consisting of three thousand, hoping the Romans in their passage through a blind Ford, driving with the stream and unevenness of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquished. But the Roman horse interposing themselves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his shining armor, of singular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battell with his Counsel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion serv'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the care of the General issue were another mans business. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having observed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, No man can avoid the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me without his reward, and due punishment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frontian Troop) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leonatus likewise wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round besetting him killed Oplacus, stoutly fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be slain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewise to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battell a long time fiercely continued with lo doubtful success, that tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epirots turning their backs.

But the death of Megacles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a most desperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was assaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of slaying the King: And at length an Horseman, Dexter by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Consul, thereby ingenerating a believe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Gracians were full of Terror, and Confentration, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Field, but that Pyrrhus assoone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witnessing, That he was a live, and present amongst them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as feare and Despaire from his owne souldiers. Lavinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedy, gaveth the Signe to his Horsemen whom he had placed in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemy. But Pyrrhus against this this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewise reserved for the last Tercio to the enemy. This one Contrivance dash'd all the Romans hopes, and gave the issue of the Battelle clearly on Pyrrhus his side. For the men themselves being all onfist at the vault rather than some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature was most open; and either shaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to fight, they ran upon their own battell, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Reckers of the Elephants following the pursuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those who flood in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beasts themselves. The Consul making use of his best skill, did as yet keep his main battell together, till, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Theffalian wing being sent amongst them, did rout and scatter them, not being able to resist. And no question but in the place they were henn'd in, they had every man been slain or taken prisoners, but that, besides the Custom of Pyrrhus, who pelted them to relinquish the pursuit, the evening likewise being far spent comt Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with his braying confounded the rest. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to cross the River in that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eleven hundred and seventy foot of the Romans and their friends slain, with two hundred and four score horsemen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horsemen: there was lost likewise two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were wanting on the Kings side; whereas Dionysius writeth, that Lavinus lost little lesse than fifteen thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but seven thousand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Victory cost Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard Orosius to say, He was no less Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battell. And when he offer'd the spoils and gifts to Jupiter of Tarentus, he confessed as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title, when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, O a truth, if I obtain such another Victory, I shall receive a grievous wound in this fight, but because others report no such thing, and that I often see the circumstances of several battells confounded, I dare not in the general silence of so many and those more accurate Authors, give credit to one single one.

That it was fought with great animosity and valour, this one argument is sufficient, That when Pyrrhus next day view'd the slain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Clemency he caus'd to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How easie were it for me to gain the Empire of the whole world, if I had but Roman Souldiers! Neither did he defer with any compement and large promises to court those who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to persuade them, he did, nevertheless treat them with great humanity and clemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach usually attends the fortune of prisoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another misfortune, though not of so great loss, yet which caus'd more fear and Religious horror. For it was impos'd to the manifest anger of the gods, that their men who were sent forth for forage amidst the stupendous noise of the Heavens, struck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty smitten and left half dead, their Cattel also by the same storm were most of them slain or made of no use.

Pyrrhus in the mean time having taken the empty and forsaken Camp of the Romans, made quick use of his victory, waiting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendship. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not assist'd him in the battell, he nevertheless gave them part of the spoils; therein much rejoicing and exulting, That by his own strength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had slain so many of the Romans. Pyrrhus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Lavinus on the other side curing his wounded, and recollecting his dispersed men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible, and the Senate (though many imputed the losse only to the Consul's default, and Fabius by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and supply to be sent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would serve their Country in the place of them who were slain, should give in their names, they list'd themselves so fast, that presently they completed the number of two Legions.

The Consul recruited with these forces, follow'd the steps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniences he could. And understanding the Kings Resolution to seize upon Capua, leading his Army thither in haile, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, he deterr'd him from assaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Course to Naples, and there likewise being frustrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long Journeys marcheth toward Rome in the Latine high way, and now having pass'd through Avanina, and the Hernician Territories, taking in Fregella by the way, he came to Praeneste within Twenty miles of the City. But the Magistrates there, affoon as they understood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senate armed their choice young men: and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this time of their Necessity, provided them another very strong help and succour: For the other Consull Tib. Corneilius, encountering the Etrurians with better success, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the Senate to the Defence of his Countrey, having no other Enemy to distract him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrhus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Armes, and considering that, besides a City secure with its own guards, he had two Consulls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Rears, returned back into Campania: where meeting Laevinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow, he said, He had to deal with a Lernæan Hydra, whose heads bring lately thrack off, spring up again in a greater Number; yet confiding in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and martialld it as resolving to fight, and that he might discover the Cheerfulness of his souldiers, and likewise terrifie the Enemy, he caus'd his men to shout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible shout, where-by conjecturing the Spirits of each, he judg'd it fit to abstain from fight at the Present, and complaining of ill omen in the Entrails of sacrifices, he drew back his Army first into his Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarentum.

The Romans (who in their hardest times had remitted nothing of their Constancy, but as to the main Issue of the warre alwayes spake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fit time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Æmilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulship. He triumphed A.D. the fourth of the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Sentine fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts: About the same time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolv'd affirmatively; that which chiefly perswaded them, was I believe the Horlemen's Cafe, for they had stoutly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horie without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds: upon this Errand were sent Embassadors of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Defolation of Sena in Gallia, C. Fabricius Lucinus, and Q. Æmilius Papus, who two yeares since were Collegues in the Consulship: Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the inseparable Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Error, esteeming all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which only being intemperately given, he did direct all his Counsells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferior to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all means before he came to Blows; he would sollicite the mind of his Enemy as he saw most opportune with Feare, or Desire, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore understanding Embassadors were coming from Rome, and judging so many Consular men were not sent but upon some Grand Affaires, he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the faster and the more honourable, he sent Lyco (by nation a Molossian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himselfe on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates. And having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Respect, liberality and plenty that might be.

They premising somewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconstancy of Fortune is, how sudden the Changes of Warre, and that future Contingents cannot be foreseen, deliver their Message, That they came to receive their Captives, whether he would suffer them at a Certain price to be redeem'd, or to be exchanged for Tarentines and others. Pyrrhus whose Custom it was, not to transact any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together; and Milo's Opinion was, That he should detain the Captives, make use of his Fortune, and not cease the Warre till he had thoroughly subdued the Romans; Cincas his Counsell was very different, for, speaking first of the Constancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often seen even in the hardest times to be invincible, he addid moreover, As for other Enemies 'tis likely we may hate their manners or contemne their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, 'tis better making Friendship then Warre, and 'tis convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Ransoms; Neither is any delay to be made, but that you send back the Embassadors with Presents, to conclude Peace upon equal Terms: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Business (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your Affairs having succeeded prosperously, you shall both more easily by Treaty obtain what you desire, and likewise seem for no other Cause but the innate Greatness and Goodness of your mind, to offer Peace unto those whom you might by force have reduced into slavery. And farre be it from Thee, but that Thy Desires should prosper as a matter to Obtaine Peace, neither can it with so much honour be treated on. When the rest agreed in the same Opinion, the King himselfe likewise assenting, commanded the Roman Embassadors to be called, to whom he spake in this Manner: *Towr Errand, Romans, I cometh to Rule, I have back the Prisoners of Warre, whom being restor'd, you are ready presently to make use of against me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficial to both Parties, without price or Ransom; otherwise if you continue hostility, I shall think it no wise part, to so be enriched by my bounty: Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embassadors, with promise he would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spoken in good Authors, When therefore they had speech together in secret without witness, among other things 'tis reported the King said thus: My desire is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteeme above all others, as most eminent in Civil and Military virtues, only one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but slender substance, you are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which justly attends Great men, as the Due. But I will not suffer you any longer to be sensible of this Injury, and despite of Fortune, I will freely bestow so large a summe of Gold and Silver, as you shall easily exceed the Revenue of the richest. For I am perswaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthly men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth: Truly I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more illustrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: so that I shall rather think you do me a Courtesy, then receive one at my hands, if you will suffer your selfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truly would I urge this to you, if on my side only the Bounty should seem Glorious, on your side the Acceptance dishonourable. But now seeing I tempt you not to Treason or the commission of any Fact misbecomming your Grave Manners; what Reason is there why you should with a resolute and obdurate mind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I desire nothing of you, but what may, nay of duty ought to be done by the best of Men, and most tender of their Countries Good, that you would perswade the Senate to forsake their wilful stubbornness, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counsells, giving them to understand the Truth; that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Loss and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the first Battell) without manifest breach of faith, and diminution of mine Honour relinquish it; Neither indeed do I delight in fighting with you whom I judge farre more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many businesses in the interim, whereby you may be satisfied concerning my Intentions, and resolve the Doubts of others; if any shall think it not safe to trust to Kings, by reason of the fault of some, who stand by their Agreements and Covenants so long only as it seemeth for their Profit, when they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have chosen rather to break their Faith then lose an Advantage. And when the Peace shall be concluded, there is nothing will please me better, or be more commodious to us Both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus, where you shall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and Partner of all my Fortunes. For I esteeme no Possession more precious then that of a Valiant and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the Splendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majesty of Royall Affairs will become your great Mind. These things if we shall in Common conferre, mutually helping one the other, we shall without any difficulty attain to the greatest Happiness that man is capable of or can imagine.*

When the King had thus made an end of speaking, after a little distance Fabricius answer'd, 'tis needlesse for me to discourse seeing you have already trusted the Relation of others concerning me. Neither is it necessary to declare my poverty, that, being the master of a little ground and a small Cottage, I maintaine my self neither by usury nor the sweat of servants, but by the labour and exercise of my owne Body, seeing this also you have truly learnt by the discourse of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, you judge me, by reason of my poverty, to be in worse condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For despising Riches, embracing Vertue, and doing my duty, I was never sensible of any misery; neither in private or publick business did I ever repine at my Fortune. For what Reason have I to speake ill of fortune, unless I should impute it as a crime to her, that I enjoy all those things which to grieve and high spirits are most desirable, not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth. The heavieſt wars are committed to my Charge, I am entrusted with the care of our moſt holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the moſt weighty affairs, I am commended and cheerfully imitated by many, neither am I leſs eſteem'd then the moſt potent man in the City; I ſeem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this beſtowing no coſt either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular menſ wealth is great, and the publick flock but ſmall, the Magiſtrates ſuſtain the dignity and ſplendor of their office by their own expence. In our City the culture is much different, no private manſ fortune being on any ſide burthened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are choſen to the adminiſtration of grand affairs, are ſo magnificently ſet forth, is of publick allowance, which order maketh all men equal, ſo that the pooreſt man ſhall want nothing for the maintaining either the publick or his own grace, neither ſhall the richeſt in any thing abound. Wherefore feeling, though I am the pooreſt of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richeſt of all; why ſhould I complain of Fortune? ſhould I deſire to be equal with Kings, who may hoard up vaſt ſums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have ſpoken in reference to my life in Publick, even in private alſo my indigence is ſo far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwiſe, as often as I compare my ſelf with the rich ones, my condition ſeemeth incomparably more happy, and I reckon my ſelf among thoſe few who have attained to ſuch Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoice and give thanks to my Poverty. For it ſeeming to me idle and fooliſh to purſue after things ſuperfluous, and that my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all neceſſaries; I know not to what end I ſhould be ſollicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes ſweet to me, and thirſt my Drink; after labour my ſleep is eaſe and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from cold, are of proof ſufficient; and my houſhold ſtuff, according as it apt and fit for thoſe uſes it was ordained to, fit to my very well pleaſeth me. So that herein alſo I find to be injurious to accuſe Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger ſubſtance then nature deſires, which hath neither ingenerated in me a covetouſneſs of what is too much, nor a dexterity of ſcraping it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judge my ſelf more wealthy then the richeſt men, yea, then thy ſelf alſo, for I have ſo much that I deſire no more, whereas unleſſe you thought your ſelf poor notwithstanding your poſſeſſion of Epirus, and all other your Territories, why came you ever into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that in my poverty can be bountiful to no body. Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things alſo I do not abound: That the gods have not endow'd me with knowledge ſuperexcellent, and the Art of Prophecy, and many other the like things, whereby I might benefit thoſe who in theſe kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens thoſe things which are in my power, and ſuffer every one in common to participate of what may any way pleaſure them, I ſhall think my ſelf free from that crime of being uſeleſs or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you cleepe thoſe things ſmall and contemptible, becauſe others ſeem greater in your eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for ſupplying the neceſſities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be deſired, and that in this reſpect the poſſeſſion of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings ſeem to be perſwaded; which, think you, were the better way of purchaſing wealth, that I ſhould now with diſgrace receive it at your hands, or that I ſhould, when it was in my power, have long ago gathered it upon moſt honeſt accounts? For my proſperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, ſo eſpecially when I overcame thoſe large and ferill Territories waſting and ſpoiling, when being conqueror in many Battels, I took for paye and demolliſ'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Soldiers being largely rewarded, and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet ſo much remaining that I carried into the Publick Treafury four hundred Talents. Now after I have ſcorn'd to acquire juſt and honeſt Riches by thoſe ſpoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before money, ſhall I receive gifts of thee, and embrace a ſhameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neglected a fair and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleaſure, and good conſcience have expended in juſt and honeſt uſes, which what I receive of you I cannot do: For that money is rather to be accounted lent then bellow'd, which proceeds from another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the ſpecious pretence of hoſpitality, friendſhip or good will, 'tis burthenſome to an Ingenious and high Spirit juſt it be reſtor'd. And if the Cenſors, who with ample authority exerciſe the ſuperinſpection of Manners amongst uſ, ſhall (according to that power wherewith they are inveſted to enquire into the Lives of the Citizens, and puniſh thoſe who deviate from the Inſtitutions of our Fathers) publicly ſummon me to give an account of the reaſons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

Many report that Pyrrhus, resolving at any rate to winne a man of such Excellent vertue, did yet more earnestly tempt his Confrancy, and after other magnificent promises, making a prof-complishment of the Kings desires, For saies he, if I am an evil man, why doe you court me? If good,
If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this businesse would prove neither pleasing nor profitable to Pyrrhus if it should succeed, for if he should make use of his liberty, it would be hateful both for the King and his Friends, as for his Justice and Abstinence, if the Epiruss once had experience of them, they would forsake the King and apply themselves wholly to him.
These things, and what hereafter I shall add, being by various Authors related, I thought neither inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and sense of those men may be known, who supported the Roman State in most difficult times, and improv'd it to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may become objects of Admiration, and trasmit to their posterity a more flourishing Commonwealth than they received from their Ancestours. These things being spoken and heard on both sides, the King at present contented himself, but on the morrow, calling Fabricius to be sent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings, as they were discouraging, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Masters command laid his snout on Fabricius his head, making a most horrid noise; but he, being a goldentime me, war to day your beast terrifie me. Afterwards being let at supper, when he heard Cynar discouraging of the Grecian Philosphers of the Self of Epicurus, that they esteemed Pleasure the greatest good, and the cares of the Commonwealth the chiefest hindrance of Felicity:
That the gods in their opinion led such a life free from the care of humane affairs, free from all Pains afflictions either of anger against the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themselves over wholly to idleness and pleasure: Fabricius thereupon is said to cry out, The gods grant that Pyrrhus and Cal-Pamphili would practice this wisdom while they wage War with the people of Rome. These were the manners of those times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counsel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were these hidden Motions and fits, or speeches premeditated out of hypocrisie for the present occasion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the constant Tenour of their Lives, whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The same Fabricius when all his silver plate consisted of one Salt-celler and a little dish, which yet was sustained by an harning foot, the Samnite Embassadors presenting him with a gift of money and very rich household stuff, set his hands to his ears, thence to his eyes, nose, mouth, throat, and at length to his belief, saying, As long as I can command these, nothing shall be wanting to me, carry ye back your money to those who stand in need of it.

After the same manner he spent his whole life, in fomuch as in all his Patrimony there was Senate cauled money for that Purpoe to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being afham'd to let those Virgins paffe without Dowry, whose Father was not afham'd to leave fo. Pal. Maximus 4-10

And such was the Gravity of the Senate, and the fidelity of every single Person, that at a thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpose, while the Romans being mollified with the fight of their dearest friends, and desirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of hatred and hostility, resolved now to send an Embassage to Rome to Treat of Peace on those Conditions he had propounded to Fabricius in Perfon, He defiring ^{that the Tarantines might be comprehended in the League, & That the other Grecians inhabiting Italy might continue free; living according to their own LAWES :} That whatsoever the Apollinians might continue free; living according to their own LAWES : That whatsoever the Apollinians might continue free; living according to their own LAWES :

Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be restored; and in Livie, the Romans should receive their Captives without Ransom. Cinesas of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledge in Civil affairs, so of very honest principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cinesas, than by his own Arms. This man being sent Ambassador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his address to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, extolled the virtues of Pyrrhus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, inasmuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: because besides other conveniences, he promised, if they would desist molesting his friends, he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consultation lasted many days (the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded, Appian Claudius, who by reason of his Age and blindness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caused himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his sons and sons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being silent both at the novelty of the thing, and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the affliction of his sickness, said, His Blindness had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now 'he was not only delighted in it, lest he should behold those things which were doing, but was 'sorry that his ears also were not deaf, that he might not hear things so sordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whether are your 'spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the 'Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his 'Fortune than his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event, and likewise his esteem amongst men would have proved far different. But now, behold how 'ye are degenerated from your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chaonians, the perpetual prey 'of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not the servant of Alexander, but his servants servant, who flying from his old enemies rather 'than seeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, should it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we send him back well beaten, laden with great 'misfortune, assure your selves, any other Party, deservedly slighting and scornful our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly slothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into 'friendship, shall carry back a Reward for that Disgrace he hath done us, in as much as by his means it is come to pass that the Romans are become a Laughing-stock to the Tarentines and 'Samnites?

This was the main scope of Appian his Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a severe Sentence, they with one consent decreed, That the War should be prosecuted, that Cinesas should the same day depart the City, that Pyrrhus should be given to understand, That neither he should be admitted into the City, (for that also was desired) neither would they, much as treat of friendship and society, till he had quitted Italy. A like law decreed by Appian his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they should not be led in War against Pyrrhus, neither should they any where be joined in the same company, nor that being sent to several Garrisons, they should, as a note of injury, change their manner of fighting, that they who before served on horse-back, should now be lifted among the foot, and they who were of the Legion, should now serve in light armature; That no man should receive his former order, till he had brought in the spoil of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Ambassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King although at the wonderful constancy of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cinesas answered, The City seemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Assembly of Kings.

After these Translations, some think, Fabricius was sent an Embassage to the King: but they are easily convinc'd of Error as by the Testimony of other Authors, so by a right Consideration of the Series of Affairs. There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and busied themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. There I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhus is reported, (for the avoiding the Dangers of shipwreck, and a more convenient passage of the Italian and Epirot Succours one to the other) to have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydrunt, where Italy gets furthest into the sea, and Apollonia, a Town situate on the adverse shore, some fifty miles distant: For that is the Breadth of the Sea in those places between the Græcians and Italian Shores. M. Terevsius Varro is said afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Megnius his Lieutenant tenant in the war against the Pirates, he guarded the Sicilian and Ionian seas with his Navy. In the midst of these doings Tib. Coruncianus the Consul Triumphed A. D. of the Calends first made by one of a Plebeian Rock. There were cessed two hundred seventy eight thousand two hundred twenty two Citizens. About these times it was that Q. Fabius Maximus was Consul at that Time. Cn. Domitius certainly was, for he lulstrated the Army, and his name is calling together the Forces of his Confederates, marched into Apulia, where he took many pietis Saverriis, and P. Decius Mus went forth with two Armies pitching Camp against Canine, was made of Fighting, but they were many days hindered as by a deep Torrent running between them, so by mutual fear on each side. The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrrhus was victorious: The Epirots were daunted at Legions: For it was given out that P. Decius after the Example of his Father and Grandfather in they died, did make the expectation of the Decian Devotion to be terrible to all Pyrrhus thinking it a matter not to be neglected, assembling his souldiers together, Thus instructed them. That the Event of Battels was not in the Power either of the Goddesses 'Earth, or the Infernal Deities, who were involv'd by that Charm, that they ought not to believe the Gods to be so unjust as to alter the fates of Armies, and below conquests for one 'mad-man's sake; that victories are not obtained by juggling tricks, and superstition, but by the field with troops of Priests and Prophets, but with Legions of armed souldiers to oppose the Enemy: But because the ignorant are commonly more terrified with their superstitious 'delusions, then with true causes of feare, he shewed that this feare might be prevented, by shewing the Habit wherein the former Decii had Devoted themselves, and warning the souldiers if they met any Man in the like accoutrement not to assault him with any weapon, but to take him alive. He caused likewise a Message to be sent to Decius, That he should forbear playing the fool amongst armed men, neither should his Plot take Effect, that if he came alive into his hands he should perhaps endure more torment then he was willing. 'Twas answer'd by the Consuls, They had Confidence enough in their Arms, neither had any need of so desperate a Design, which that he might be assured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent, or Expect the Romans on his side the water; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a safe passage over, or if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each side encountering with their strength entire, demonstration might be made, that they repos'd all their hopes of victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrrhus was ashamed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted therefore of the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of fording the River. The Terror of the Elephants was not now so great to the Romans, as being accustomed to see them, so having had Experience that their snouts might easily be cut off, as one was in the last fight at one blow by C. Atinucius the foremost Pike-man of the Fourth Legion. But now they bethought themselves of safer guards and Defences; They caused horses clothed with Iron plates to draw Chariots, which were likewise full stuck with spears fastned in Iron sockets, in the Chariots were placed souldiers who with darts or fire should avert the fury of the Elephants. The Legions with this furniture having passed the River, Pyrrhus in a singular and Excellent manner martial'd his Army, according to his Custom wherein he was thought to exceed all Commanders of his Time. Observing therefore the Nature of the place, which would well admit of a foot Army only, he placed his horse and Elephants in the Reserve. Right wing he strengthened with his own souldiers and the Samnite Auxiliaries, The Brutians Lucanians and Sallentines he placed in the midst, the Tarentines whose virtue he least confided in, he order'd in the midst. The Consul's main body consisted of their Legions, some of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt; and with the like Discretion they distinguished the Orders of their Reserves. The horse were distributed into the Wings, being no hindrance to the Foot fight, and yet upon occasion offer'd, ready for Action. The Arms being equal, not the only in Courage but in number (for they were forty thousand strong on both sides) disputed neither side, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morning Pyrrhus when he had guarded the most difficult places, forced the Romans to descend into a more even and open ground; there he had some use of his Elephants, which being suddenly brought in to that part of the Battell last fight) and caused them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. The Report of this Fight is much different from that of the former, for some Authors affirm, The Romans had the upper hand, their Victory being occasion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order sent against those who came to surprise the carriages) by their departure seeming to fly, by a mean error and false fear caus'd all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly inded. The number of the slain is likewise express'd, That on Pyrrhus his side twenty thousand, on the Romans side five thousand were wanting, that the King with a dart shot through his arm was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to stay the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the last, that on his side three and fifty Colours were left, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Consul's Lieutenant was likewise wounded. But contrariwise, others say, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps sustained not so much loss; but that they did conquer easily, and left six thousand men; that Pyrrhus left three thousand and five hundred and five, as it is in the Kings Chronicles registered, by the Testimony of Hieronimus.

And not only variety But Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to those who report the event of this Battel to have been doubtful: for 'tis ordinary after an equal encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themselves, which by the negligence or Impudence of others is committed to writing, doing every ill to deliver to Posterity for true and undoubted, those things which are grounded on Idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their history seems more probable who affirmes, That there was but one Fight near Asculum, and that, after an hot dispute and much blood shed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the loss of the Baggage did with much ado break off the fight: That then both Armies founded a Retreat, when on both sides there were slain about fifteen thousand, and that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd one who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be vanquish'd we are undone our selves. And indeed the sequel confirms this Opinion, for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentum, and the Consuls, making no pursuit after the enemy, distributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of year gave them leave, and Reasons of War might well have persuaded them, to have prosecuted so glorious a victory. Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decius in this Battel devoted himself, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himself the Third sacrifice, without intermission out of the same family, for the good of the Commonwealth. Which as I had no thoughts to gain say, So should I not have related in the general history of all Histories, but that a grave Author M. Tullius Cicero in his books of Philology more than once maketh mention of it. The fight at Asculum thus ended, the rest of the year was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time spent in Consultation and preparations. Pyrrhus, having lost most of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, sent into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next spring. But before that Navy could be set forth, new hopes arising alter'd the Kings Counsels. Pyrrhus had sometime the possession of Macedonia, wresting it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again lost it by the Power of Lysimachus. Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Ptolemaeus Ceraunus being slain by the Gauls, there seem'd a new way open into Macedonia, being deliv'd of a Prince and the state of affairs in Confusion. This Reason persuad'd him not to leave Epirus naked of soldiers, lest it should be obnoxious to the injuries of the Gauls who now oppress'd the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then steer his Course homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past over in these Cares the New Consuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Papus (who before had born a Consulship together) which Pyrrhus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to observe the Marches and Counsels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far distant, there hapned an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the same manner: One Timotheus an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, secretly came to Fabricius, and promised him, if he would give him an answerable reward to Poison the King; which he thought was easie for him to accomplish by his sons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treason, inform'd the Senate of it. The Senate, not discovering the Treason of Timotheus, who had (by what means soever) intended the Roman profit, sent Embassadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general warn him, That he should look well about him, and take heed of what men's service he made use of, and enquire into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the business, and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Consuls, reciting also the Letter of the Consuls, wherein they discover Nicetas his design. That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or with money, and with the King safe from Treason, hoping he will become an Illustrious Ornament to their Victory and Triumph.

Some Report it was the Kings Physician who treated with Fabricius either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, so no question they are deceived who say that Curius sent back the Physician to the King. This said that Pyrrhus at this time wondering at the Experience of so great Virtue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no little difficulty serve from the Rules of Justice and Honesty, then the Sun be turned out of his Course. He did immediately, lest he should be Overcome with Kindness, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Cineas again to obtaine peace and friendship. It seem'd dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemy, where-tue, they therefore thought to have abhorred wickedness more for gain then for the love of Victory, might not be received gratis. This publick abstinence was to their greater Credit Grounded by the virtue and resolution of private persons, when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cinetium, and others, and others again, there was not so much as one man or woman to be found so mean or covetous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The former answer was now again returned to the Embassadors, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemy to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not knowing how to prosecute the War with any cheerfulness, he relolv'd to undertake (after long and doubtful deliberation) he relolv'd to undertake, the management whereof (after war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island obtained, he them. For they suspecting the Kings designs, had a little before hand sent Magas with a Navy of an hundred and twenty ships, saying, The Romans ought to be assisted against a foreign enemy. And though the Romans used not their assistance, making answer, That they this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be specially excepted, that they might assist one the other, which sever-nians were provoked to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthagi-nians should provide ships, each party pay their own soldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans Magas went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings Counsels, whom the Carthaginians had understood to be invited into Sicily. And they offer'd to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, lest he should spoil their successes in Sicily which shou-Beer, pretending the siege of Rhegium, but indeed relolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmi-ting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which fil-tered him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one only remedy of their calamities whereunto they were more sharply afflicted then the most miserabl-ed, one Mamo, born at Agestis, a City of Sicily, more lamentable then under serv-tyranny to usurp the government, was by Hicetas the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Carth-ginian forces: Hence arose an heavy war and unfortunate to the Syracusans, by which ne-of Agrigentum, he held the Island long time in trouble, till by the boldness of one Theno he-tain the Sovereignty, was reliev'd by Systratus a Syracusan Nobleman. These two along re-time contested, Theno possessing Naxos, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Systratus ex-ercising the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by these discords they-saw nothing but destruction likely to ensue, with one consent they decreed to lend for Pyr-Lanassa, was thought fittest to bear rule, and next in succession, as having a son by Diogenes their affairs. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Leontium, offering the Go-vernment of their Cities, and consequently of the whole Island, unanimously intended him, Theno-boring under the heavy burden of a Barbarous slavery. For the Carthaginians having wait'd Diodorus hundred ships, and an Army of fifty thousand men, Pyrrhus therefore without delay sendeth Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian con-federates, promising, That if they were oppress'd by the Romans he would in speed come out of the-neighbor Island much increased with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Gari-son on these conditions he was call'd in, or that at least he would leave their City free. They-lesure. The Epitot King being thus employ'd, the Consuls had the easier war against their-enemies. I find they had about this time good success against the Etrurians, Lucanians, there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engag'd, by the Samnites, who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. Among the other nations as the war was more heavy, so was the Victory more Illustrious over them. C. Fabricius the Consul (his Colleague, as is imagined, being gone into Etruria, inasmuch as upon the Epirots departure one Consular Army was thought sufficient) overcame the Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites: Some Cities, among which were Heraclea, he drew into Covenant's, and over those people he Triumphed before the Ides of December.

Quintilian's 1.

An assembly of the people being held, New Consuls were chosen for the year ensuing, P. Cornelius Rufinus again, and C. Junius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidates with Rufinus, but by Fabricius his favour he was chosen. Wherein Fabricius considering the times, prefer'd the publick safety before private quarrels; For by reason of their difference in Manners there was Enmity betweene these two, Fabricius being of proove against Momy was guided only by his care of the common good; Rufinus more greedy of wealth then ordinary, many times order'd his counsels and actions to his private gain. But being otherwise Industrious and a good commander, Fabricius judg'd him to be prefer'd before his Competitors who were far inferior to him in Marshal affairs. 'Tis reported, when Rufinus gave him thanks,

That being at enmity with him he had helped him to the Consulship, especially when so great a War was on foot; he answer'd, 'Twas not much to be wonder'd, if he had rather be pillag'd, then sold to the enemy. For there was great War remaining in Italy, and Pyrrhus finding all things goe according to his desire in Sicily (whether he now was gone) 'twas reasonably fear'd he would quickly return a more formidable enemy by the Access of the strength of so Noble an Island.

W H I L E these things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, sail'd from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continued two years and four moneths in Italy. Being conducted by Thasio, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful cheerfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Money and their Ships. Being thus in a short time possessor of the dominion of the Græcian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatsoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybaum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient situation, defended against all its assaults. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolv'd, leaving his eldest son the Patrimony of his Father, to settle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years sustained both foreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, seem'd willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreas'd by the covetousness and arrogance of his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and safety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, seeing private men are blam'd only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. But these things things; hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tyndarion Prince of the Tauromitians (for in that part of the Island he landed) then by the People of Catana, and so pass'd with his host-Army to Syracuse: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the shore, ready without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginians the Admirall refus'd to venture on the Fight with the Rest. Wherefore Entering without Resistance, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre.

In the Interim came Embassadours from the Leontines, whose Prince Heracidas offer'd the City and all his Forces. Four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Neither were other Cities slower in their submission, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrrhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, sent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if any one should cease so favourably to pass over into Africa. Things went not so well with his Confederates in the hostility of the Romans, now in the absence of the King and his main strength. But Zonasus as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarentine warre, both their Castles surpriz'd, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forsaken by their Friends) being inferior both in strength and Courage, forsaking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountains, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in such a Tumult and feare conceat Negligence and Carelessness (the Inseparable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their Disgrace; for their souldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult passages were beaten back and destroy'd by the Samnites, who had posses'd themselves of advantageous places; many others having no convenience either of retreating or fighting were taken alive. This Accident caus'd the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Misfortune upon his Colleague, boasted he could have managed the business with better success if he had forces against the Lucanians and Brutians; where carrying about the Terror of his Armes, In the utmost parts of the Italian shore, towards the East and the Ionian sea, where the pro-allo considerable for it's Wealth. Through the midst of it in those dayes ran the River Acheron, Old Matam on each side whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encompass'd with a wall of Twelve miles circumference. This City the Consul not daring to beleagere, had thoughts of obtaining by Treachery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now destitute of foreign Aide, he might easily take it by the help and assistance of those who were weary of Pyrrhus his Domination. But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or suspicion of Treason, which is seldom long hid, the Crotonians had procur'd aid from Atile: Nicias Frontinus aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) beat him back with the slaughter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus desiring by Council to remedy that loss he had by his Rashness sustain'd, on set purpose encreaseth the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might seem strucken with the greater fear pretends to desert from his Enterprize, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a sudden Departure. This News was quickly blaz'd about the City (as from a Camp so near mult needs be) and besides a probable cause of the business, their Credulity was help'd forward by their desire to have it so, born on a sudden (their minds being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being therunto furnished by the Consul, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as if in this hally departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Escape; He informs them that Cornelius Rufinus, having not strength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being invited by some who promised to bury it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And withall they Zonasus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth swiftly with his forces the neerer way to Locri, intending to defend it, which when Rufinus by secret Messengers understood, he turneth back presently to Croton, as upon better advice, so with better success then before. His diligence was for a thick mist chanced to surround him, so that he was almost within the walls with his Zonasus for a Victorious Victorious army before the Crotonians understood he was returned. The joy of this victory, of it self ample enough, was abundantly encreased by other as glorious successes; Fortune seldom observing a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus perceiving himself to have fallen into a remediless Error, not knowing what to do, as he returned to Tarentum, was met by Rufinus, lost great part of his men, and very hardly escaped himself with the Rest; When not being content to defend one Cite he lost two. For the Locrians likewise being animated with this success, having slain the garrison Pyrhus left among them, with the governour of it, whose oppression they could no longer endure, betook themselves to the friendship of the Romans. Notwithstanding this Procelle of affaires, the Samnites and other nations were not so far dejected, but that still they resolved to endure the worst that Fortune could bring upon them, encouraged, beside their own innate obduracy, with their Hops of Pyrhus's Return, hearing the news of his victories in Sicily. For Pyrhus (that we may relate his actions out of Italy also, which were performed in those times and places, having influence upon, and being joyned with the Roman affaires) having settled things at Syracuse and Leontium, went about the same time with his Army to Agigentum, meeting Messengers by the way with News, that the Carthaginian Garison was thrust out of the City, and that the Agigentines yielded themselves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Sisistratus (who had delivered up Syracuse to him) together with the Cite, presented him with eight thousand foote, proper young men, and eight hundred horse, a force nothing inferior to the Epirotes Pyrhus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Sisistratus had the command of, did by his means submit themselves to the Kings discretion.

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all sorts of weapons and engines, which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Carthaginian Jurisdiction, having an army of thirty thousand, besides fifteen hundred horse, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The first he tooke was Heraclæa, where was a Punic garrison, then Acrona; After which the Selinuntians, Halicyans, and Agellians following his fortune forsook the Carthaginian party, giving an Example to many other Townes in the same quarter of doing the like. The Erycines, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to assault, having therefore ordered his men, himselfe armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he should manifest himself to the Graecians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the signe was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrows being driven from their stations, gave way to the placing ladders upon the walls, the King himselfe first of all men entered into a most noble fight against all opposers, tumbling some down with his shield, slaying others with his sword, and terrifying all with the greatness of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the Cite at that one storm, his soldiers being no lesse animated by his Example then fearful of his danger, for both which reasons they fought with the greater contention. He then did sacrifice to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of several kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of January. But I wonder to find it ascribed to C. Iunius, seeing Rufinus his Province was amongst them, and that he tooke two famous Cities, and that other Authors stile him a Triumphant Man.

Rome being not very secure, considering the progress of Pyrhus his affairs, was otherwise much terrified with Prodigies and Pestilence. The most horrid Omen was, that the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus being smitten with Thunder, the head thereof was stricken off and carried quite away, neither could it be found but by the art and care of the South-ayers. The Plague likewise committed great slaughter amongst them, taking away man and beast by a common Murrain; but was most formidable in Athorinas, for there was no young ones almost of man or beast which came forth safe and entire, inasmuch as it was believed the anger of the gods would consume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Consulship of Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgus very famous, wherein he had C. Genucius Clepsius for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Samnites and Lucanians; and two certain arguments there are that they made great slaughter of their enemies, for the same year Q. Fabius the Consul Triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quirinals; and those people sent Letters to Pyrhus and Embassadors, declaring, They were utterly undone without speedy help, that they could no longer sustain the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the uttermost extremity by yielding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyrhus to depart the Island and transport his forces again into Italy, seeing also his affairs now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and by the consideration of some injuries received, were turned into hatred against him.

Which his resolution, and the series of ensuing affairs, that they may the better be understood, I have thought good more at large to relate his Actions at the present. When therefore he had possessed himself of Eryx, and placed a Garison in it, he marched to the City of the Æginæ which is of a very convenient situation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his Camp to Panormus it self, which received its name from the fair and ample haven which leadeth to it: This he took by force, and having likewise taken a place called Epiride, located in possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybæum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Mæzians, whose town Dionysius the Tyndomians in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, resolved with their utmost strength to defend it against the preparations they understood of Soldiers, seeing that of all their Wherefore bringing in either a considerable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as of the seas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fence it on every side: Especially ditched: Their work was the sooner finished, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the sea, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, equal conditions, to assist him with money and ships. Pyrhus would hear no mention of money, desiring only to retain those Cities he had taken, seeming willing to allow them the possession of Lilybæum. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him, That so long as the Carthaginians held Lilybæum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sicily) the Island would never be void of the fear of them; caused him to return answer, That here and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he lay his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marshalling his army not far from began the assault. But the Lilybæans having a sufficient number of Souldiers to defend them, brought in many Catapults and Scorpions that the whole compass of the walls was not able to receive them.

Camp

When therefore a shower of all sorts of weapons and darts overwhelmed the Kings Men, slaying many and wounding more, they desisted from their Enterprize. Pyrhus likewise felt himselfe to work to make Engines of Battery, beside those he brought from Syracuse, and digging resisting, when he had for almost two months wearied himself in yaine, and saw that the besieged having free egress and regress at sea, the Cite could not be taken, he broke up his siege being compelled to pay tribute, implored his assistance against the Mamertines, living upon the sea coast. Pyrhus therefore leading his Army in halt, when he had taken and slain some Mamertines he found gathering Taxes in those places, Encountering their main body proved Conquerour, and took by force and demolish'd many of their Garrison. And hitherto the King by his illustrious performances had obtained great Power and Honour, having beside his other Vertues, with his singular Humanity not only won, but deserv'd the Love and Affections of the Cities. But this so great Felicity, which one would think so firmly grounded, was in the moment destroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by the Intemperance of his friends, so chiefly by the Kings own fault. Who, being in adversity irreprehensibly good, was puff'd up with pride in his prosperity, in which Condition Mens Fickles necessary for the accomplishment of his undertaking, and that though he had many ships, yet they were not well furnish'd with Sea men, he very much offended the City with strict Pre's of Sea-men; being now on a sudden changed, and from his former gentleness proterolatered, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they saw those very men to be slain, by whose good will and assistance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by ship, and applied themselves (as for every one was most opportune) some to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines. So that cruelty, which when it is alone is always grievous, traffeth (beside the hatred properly due to it self) the detestation of an unthankful and perfidious mind. He seemeth to have brought himself to this necessity of governing by violence, them (being no whit better) did he bestow the riches which were sequestered from the friends and kinsmen of Agathocles. The chief Magistracies of Cities he committed to the Penioners and Captains, not according to the statutes and customs of the Cities, nor for the due time prescribed, whole administration of publick busineses he assumed to himself, referring many to his Familiars and Favourites, who were hateful for their avarice and luxury; a like intent upon gaining and spending money by wickedness, who being greedy to satisfy their own lust, make no distinction between between Right and Wrong. Mens minds being hereby in confes they began first to murmur, afterward openly to Complain, why they had repented of their former Condition, if now the very same things were to be born Withall? that in vain was Pyrrhus invited and received, if he studied to imitate those manners: he came to punish; that no injury can possibly be so sharp sense and Apprehension, as that whereof he is the Author who ought to have been the Avenger. And now many began not very obscurely to move sedition, and cause a Revolution of things, whereas he hearkening to pernicious Council, chose rather to encrease causes of Offence, then take them away: as if what evil was by Injustice committed, were by Cruelty to be mended. In the mean time the Carthaginians, observing that Pyrrhus was not very strong in his own Country forces, and was daily less affected by the Sicilians, conceiving hopes of recovering their lost Province, had sent over a new Army which found business enough for the Epirots, many flying over to them who stood in fear of Pyrrhus's cruelty. Pyrrhus under pretence of the Punick War, introducing Garrisons into the Cities, resolved by false accusations of Treason to take away the lives of the greatest men, thinking afterward the more easily to keep the people in awe. At length he aimed at Thenio and Sosistratus, the principal men of the whole Island, by whose assistance chiefly (as we have declared) he obtained the command of Sicily. Thenio was slain, Sosistratus fled to the enemy, affording him no less help and authority to the calling Pyrrhus out of Sicily, then he had before to the bringing him in and confirming him there.

Upon this many Cities revolting, greater part to the Carthaginians, some to the Mamertines, Pyrrhus his affairs were reduced from a most flourishing Condition to a very narrow and evil state. In this Conjunction the embassage of his Italian confederates came not unwelcome to him, complaining, That having lost all things, they had very few Cities left which were able with much ado to keep the Enemy from entering their walls. This gave him a faire and honourable Pretence of departing, that he might seeme, not expelled out of Sicily by the Carthaginians, But to return into Italy for the Relief of his oppressed associates. Being now full going, when he seriously considered the situation and wealth of the Island, and disposition of the Inhabitants, O (saith he) what a fair field do we leave the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in for Supremacy! And his Prefage proved true, as was witnessed by the wars suddenly ensuing, wherein four many Navies were destroyed, and Armies routed.

But the Enemies Courage increasing with their Fortune, Pyrrhus had neither a safe departing out of Sicily, nor a quiet Voyage to the Tarentines in Italy. The Carthaginians assailing him in his Passage cross the sea, sunk seventy of his ships, and made the rest useless; the Epirots almost utterly unskilful in Maritime affairs, being not able to grapple with men of such Experience therein) so he fled out of the Fight with Twelve ships into Italy, who had come thence, with above an hundred, besides a greater number of ships of Burthen. But gathering together those fouldiers who made a shift from the Overthrow to escape to shore, he had presently a strength so great that he conceived hopes of taking Rhegium by storme. But being beaten off by the Campanians who defended it, he presently fell into a great danger. For as he led his Army through blind and difficult passages, the Enemy out of Ambush fell upon his Reare, and slew a great Number of his Men, with two Elephants. 'Twas no contemptible force, neither for Number nor the quality of the Warriours, which thus assaulted him; they were little less then ten thousand old fouldiers, most of them Mamertines, who trusting in their friendship and cognation with the Rhegians, having understood that Pyrrhus intended to return for Italy, had crossed the sea before him, and in hope of prey had privily disposed of themselves in advantageous places to make a sudden irruption upon him.

Pyrrhus, according to his wonted Boldness fighting in the front of his Battel, received a wound in his head, when he was gone aside to dress, one of the enemies of large stature, and gallant in his Armour, advancing before the rest of his Fellows, Challeng'd him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were alive, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anger, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running about his face, his men not being able to hold him, made a sudden assault upon him, and with a blow on his head struck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his sword was so well temper'd and his Arms so strong, that at one stroke he cleft the Man in sunder, even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each side divided falling to the ground. The enemy terrified with the strange novelty of this spectacle, and admiring him as above the ordinary Rank of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrhus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithstanding little joy. For, inasmuch as he now lost part of his Carriages, and that the wealth he had gather'd by the spoils of the Sicilians, was lost in his last fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, so that his fouldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elsewhere to provide it, he was compell'd to seize upon the Treasury of Proserpine: Her Church at Lacri was in those dayes most famous for the Reputation of its holiness; which town, when Pyrrhus had taken by the assistance of his Faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by laughter and rapine, more then the just revenge of his slain Garrison did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereto by his worst friends, who had most commonly been the authors of every pernicious counsel: These were Evagoras the son of Theodorus, Balacer the son of Nicander, and Dinarchus the son of Nicias. They did not only per-swade Pyrrhus, telling him that all things must yield to Necessity, but were themselves involved in the sacrifice, digging up a vast summe of Gold, which had many years been preserved in vaults under ground. Pyrrhus rejoicing said, there is nothing more foolish then not to follow Reasonable Devotion, and not to accept of Money ready prepar'd to one's hand is the part of a mad Assin. And putting it into his ships he gave order to have it carried to Tarentum, himself going by land.

But this his fact was not more foule in the Commission, then it was unhappy in the Issue. A storme suddenly arising upon the change of Wind, in the night time, turned about the ships, conveyed the Holy Money being shatter'd and torne into pieces, were sunk with all the men in them, but the money it self lying upon some loose planks, was by the waves carried to the shore very near the Temple, from whence it was the day before taken. Pyrrhus understanding the Accident, commanded the money to be diligently gather'd up and returned to his place, thinking thereby to appease the Angry Deity. Nevertheless henceforward he had no better success, Fortune Eluding all his Designs whatsoever, even those which were upon good advice, and Virtuously undertaken. Which he did always after constantly impute to the Anger of the Offended Goddesse, as Proserpine the writer of his History, and himself in his Commake propitiation to Proserpine, he put to death all the Authors of that unhappy Council, the instruments of the Fact, and every one who had but slightly consented to the Commission of it. And these being executed according to their Deserts, Pyrrhus prosecuting his De- both Divine and Humane for their Relief. 'Twas an old opinion, that the Pestilence might be Rayed by the Dictators striking in of a Naile, for the Experiment of which hopes 'tis probable that P. Cornelius Rufinus was chosen Dictator, for as the greatness of the Calamity might well provoke them to try all Remedies, so we find that Rufinus was the year after taken notice of by the Censours, when he had been twice Consul and twice Dictator, neither can there be found a more certain monument of, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatorship. Against the sickness providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefest care and diligence. Besides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Pestilence had made men weary of service. But the severity and constancy of M. Curius Dentatus the second time Consul overcame their wishfulness, for he now had entered the Magistracy with L. Cornelius Lentini his Colleague. When therefore in the Capitoll he first began his Leavy, because no man answered, he caused the names of all the Tribes to be cast into an Urne, and the Pellian Tribe was first called, he caused the first man of that Tribe whose name was drawn to be summoned to the Tribunes complaining of the Consuls Injustice, he sold him also, saying, The Common wealth had no need of such Citizens who knew not how to obey. The Tribunes nevertheless did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholesome grew into Custom for a slave. Others being terrified by this Precedent did the more readily give in their Names, and having filled up their Legions both the Consuls marched into the Enemies Country; Lustered his army at Tarentum, and found himself almost twenty Thousand strong in Foot, together with three thousand horse.

With these and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Sammium, but found not the Inhabitants so obedient as heretofore, they came not in so freely and readily as they had done, not only because their courage was over-wearied with the great and many losses they had sustained, but because they were justly exasperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrhus's ates. Nevertheless he gathered together to great a strength, that he sent one part into Lucania to buse the other Consul, while himself encountered Man. Curius, thinking if he once over-derstanding, that there is no Battalia comparable to the Macedonian Phalanx, when it hath expected help from Lucania, and that the Auguries also and Enrallies of bealls promised no good success, he declined fight as much as might be: so much the more earnest was Pyrrhus to Army those who were most forward, he resolved to assault the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be discovered. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpose, he fell into a deep sleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that abundance of blood flowed out of his mouth; in consideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to desert from his enterprize, but his friends earnestly perswading him, Left he should never again have the same opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. Male.

Maleventum (for that was the name of it in those dayes) are Mountainous and Woody places, which by degrees stretching themselves into somewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Taurinus Fields.

Plutarch
Now Pyrrius beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wildered for want of knowledge in the wayes, in so much that (the day breaking) he was discovered from the Roman Camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemy, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their sacrifices now proving more favourable) with the Consul's conduct cheerfully issued out, and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This success encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and defend into the open field in Battel-array prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both sides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrius now again sought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Reserve. There had the Consul placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an easie and ready way to oppose these beasts, that they were sooner diverted by fire than the sword: Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being set on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beasts, or on the wood of the Towers, they stuck fast by reason of their hooked sharp points. These instruments and divers sorts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, so that their masters not being able to govern them, they rushed back upon their own battel, filling it with fear and slaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young Elephant, which being wounded in his head, sent forth a querulous noise, at which known voice the Dam was first startled, and the increasing tumult, at length the rest were all in confusion and turned into flight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the slain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrius being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the rest of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to stand against them. 'Tis said the King in that Battel had thrice the number of the Romans, even fourscore thousand foot, and fix thousand horse; of these they who report the most say, fix and thirty thousand were slain, they who report the least, say six and twenty thousand, thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants. Pyrrius with a few horsemen escaped to Tarentum. The Camp of Pyrrius being taken, as it caused admiration, so was it of great use to the Romans. For they heretofore, as other people, ordered their Camp scattering by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrrius is held to be the first who rightly measuring and dividing spaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench; and by his example the Romans being assisted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that most perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they used.

This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reason also of Domestick affairs, and the notable severity of their City Discipline. Q. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, being Censors together, took away from many the Publick honours, and passed by many in calling the Senate. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rufinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Consul and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Censors, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his house the weight of ten pounds in plate to serve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, but Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parlimony of this Citie in those dayes, and afterward to great the extravagancy, that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would shortly esteem but a base and contemptible piece of household stuffe: Every mans estate being ceased and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were ceased two hundred seventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Consuls entered the Capitoll in triumph, first Curius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the fame of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in Pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were set out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons, nor any spoiles led but flocks and herds of Cattel. But now there was a worthy shew both for the variety of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the Spoils. Epirots, Thessalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond sea rarities, and the instrument of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyfull spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs (for the rest were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Buli, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their denomination from the place they first saw them in; within few dayes after was the other Con-sulls Triumph nothing so gallant, though his performances were not to be despised, he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Curius stood on them for their Courage, he gave to Srv. Cornelius Merenda a Crown of Gold out of the spoiles, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different happy fight, their mindes were so filled with fear and Indignation that they could take no Rest.

The King having been a long time averse from the Roman Warre, now utterly despairing of the Conquest, thought of nothing more then how to get safely and honourably out of Italy. But keeping his Countell to himselfe, he encouraged his Associates, That they should not be cast down by one unlucky Overthrow, that they had not received so much loss by the last fight, as upon equal Conditions; That now they should imitate the Roman Constancy, and reserve themselves for better fortune, and all would yet go well; That there is yet strength sufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expect succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially Ptolomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifestly assisted; he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Epirots (then a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Ilyrium, having obliged some by Courtreies, others by Fear. Yet all his boasting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the seas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Foreign Aid. Sending nevertheless his Embassadors to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, of some he craved moneys, of others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With these hopes keeping his associates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all fore his own and the Italian Princes, he read upon them not those Letters which now he readily to be sent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Associates, as also the Romans made the Ceraunian Mountaines a Promontory of Epirus. But that he might seem not disappointed the Design he was call'd aside for, he left behind him Asila to defend the Castle ment, continue faithfull, he gave him a seat whose cover was made of Nicias his skin, whom he had put to death for his Treason against him. Leaving therefore with him a garrison of souldiers, with the Rest (to wit eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse) he returned into his Kingdom, having been six yeares absent. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrius had renewed the warre, they did at their Assembly chooe M. Curius Consul again, because he only having had good success against the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with greatest Authority, and best fortune, of the Patricians Srv. Cornelius Merenda was chosen, under whose command he was last year; These being made Consul, converted the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the for-Valiant K. Pyrrius fled not so much for the overthrow sustain'd, as fearing such a Captain as having chosed Pyrrius out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Curius his Third Consulship, there came Ambassadors from the Alexandrine Kings with gifts to Rome, and in the Consulship of C. Dors and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomeus Philadelphus hearing of Pyrrius his flight, sent to congratulate with the Romans, and to desire to be esteemed their Friend and Associate. The Romans thought it very honourable that their Friendship was sought by Kings so Potent and farre distant, therefore courteously receiving and whereof, and to return the like kind office to the Kings, they sent Ambassadors to him chosen out of their Principal Men, of the Consuls Q. Fabius Gurges, and with him C. Fabius Epi. Livie, Pistor, and Numerius Fabius Pistor, and Q. Ogulnius. These being gone, the Consuls had good success against the Italian People, who kill out of Necessity and Despaire kept up their Armes. The Triumph which Claudius Canina made in the Quirinals over the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, is an Argument, that his Actions were of the greater Consequence: But the Joy of all this Prosperity was somewhat diminish'd by Sexilia a Vestall Vir-gin, who against the Rules of her Order being found guilty of Incest, was thought to provoke

But

But appealing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buried her alive at the Colline Gate. While the same men were Consuls there were Colonies planted, Cela among the Volscians, and in Lucania Paphlagonia, which the Greeks call Pepidonia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Samnites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Carvilius the second time Consuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Consuls was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Carvilius the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great slaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to sue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixed) Papirius had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth the death of Pyrhus, the subtility of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

Pyrhus, when two years since he failed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentus, thereby to beget hopes of his return, which afterward being the more confidently expected by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a set battel, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear lest he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being insatiably desirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of retelling Cleomenes in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Arens) he entred Peloponnesus with a purpose to keep it in his own hands, and though he did in vain assault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedemonians with great calamities. In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions, Arifippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Arifias Patron of the other invited Pyrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to assist the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brafs Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was justly possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an ancient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolv'd to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and souldiers coming in to his succour, meeting Helennus the son of Pyrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some striving to go out, some to come in, the enemy likewise fore pressing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedemonians who came along with Arens, some Elephants also, all crowding and being crowded one by another in narrow streets, caused great fear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrhus in the midst of all, every where endeavouring to protect his own, and beat back the enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Argos lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (sitting among others upon the house top to behold the fight) when the saw Pyrhus in fury and violence setting upon him who wounded him, being astonished at her son's danger, suddenly snatched up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miserable and void of honour was Pyrhus his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Council or skill in Marshal affairs, besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry in the acquiring.

This news, being brought into Italy, did diversly, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what terms they could; But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Milo governor of the Castle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injuries and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; so that the Tarentines being on each hand pressed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, sent Embassadors to crave succour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coast-Towns of Italy rather in their own hands then the Romans, readily came with a high-maintenance to only to call out Milo, but resolving, if they gained Tarentus, to Livie Epitom. maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tarentus was shut up on all sides, the Romans beleaguering that part of the City and Castle by land, the Carthaginians beleaguering the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affairs, being no less solicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should take it; but by his means they obtained Tarentus, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, safely to depart with bag and baggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines. That joining Councils together to prevent more convenient for him, safety: and at length persuades them, To send himself Embassadors to Papirius, to Livie Epitom. conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly heretofore assented out of weariness of Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had secretly contrived his Designe, brings back pretty faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much security and confidence lay aside all care and Circumspection, giving Milo opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the City it self up to the Romans. The Carthaginians, who were not whit contented with this Event, nevertheless pretending, That they did nothing with evil Conscience, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoisted sails and returned. Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intended to Livie Epitom. ed this admonition, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only lighted chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing with evil Conscience, or deceitful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Generals, or that the people commonly discourse so, while the Romans brook not the others preference, and the Carthaginian endeavour'd to keep close their design; so I think there afterwards arose more probable causes of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians.

Coast-

The Consuls returning home, were received with the joy and salutes of all, and triumphed in great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time Q. Fabius Gurgus, more Capitoline Mur. and the others who were sent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Result of their Embassy, Capitoline Mur. That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, Capitoline Mur. great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and assistance, modestly to refuse the gifts, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other business, added to the publick Treasury; that at Alexandria, when being invited to publick feasts, Capitoline Mur. in the night time put them upon the King's Statues, they did for luck's sake receive them, but Capitoline Mur. they had by their Journey, and the Gravity of the Embassy, giving them thanks, Capitoline Mur. ed the gifts they had conveyed into the Treasury to be restored them. The people likewise decreed the like, saying, The Commonwealth would be excellently well managed if the safe means of Capitoline Mur. growing rich by Publick employments were taken away: And the Questors, according to command, willingly restoring the money, the Embassadors worthy of the reward of their Abstinence, did with as much credit receive the Egyptian gifts as they had refused them. Capitoline Mur. was prime man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preferred before his equals, being now, by reason of the Nobility of the Senate by M. Curium and L. Papirius the Centumvirs, and as many Triumphs, inferior to none in Honour. The same men being Consuls, Capitoline Mur. the Centor was at coast, out of the enemies spoils, to bring the water of the River on a time by some ill-willers taxed of encrease his private wealth by them, that being wood which he was wont to use in sacrifice, took Oath, That of all the enemies plunder, he never brought nothing else into his house. He was a man indeed of high deserts, as for the great by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings; For I count it not unworthy or unbecomingly the Office of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to be by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was had the first taste of Riches) Curium, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but to have and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardiness of life. For when the Grounds of the Enemy were appropriated to the Common wealth, he distributed to every private Person but forty Acres by the Man: And the Senate allotting him a greater portion, he being contented with the same Measure he had meted to others, said, He Plutarch Was no good Citizen who would not be satisfied with as much as others were. This was afterward the Curian Cottage among the Sabines, where when the Samnites (being lately overcome) found him frying of Carrots, and presented him with a vast summe of Gold, I had rather, sayes he, Plutarch eat these out of my Earthen platters, and rule over those who are rich in gold. Near this place Cato the Elder having a Farm, went often thither, and contemplating in his mind the poore Tenement and Little Ground, which so Eminent a Man after three Triumphs, tilled with his own hands, together with the Temperance and abstinence of his Life, did thereby provoke himself, out of the Emulation of his virtue, to the like Confrancy and simplicity of Manners. And truly there needed such men to lay the foundations of a future Empire so firm, as it might bear the weight of the superstructure, and not only resist the forms of the Enemy from abroad, but scarcely and with much adoe be ruined by its own inbred Vices.

H E most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace settled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more severe revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended, they were therefore commanded to resign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old score more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They foreseeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not pass unrevenged, had very diligently taken care for whatsoever belonged to strengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conscious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the same arts be maintained. Besides their own innate Fierceness, they much confided in the friendship of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their success against the Carthaginians and Pyræus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the strength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulsed the enemies from the siege. They forced therefore to such an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Pyron, which was by some betrayed to them, they flew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Consul, who was that year Colleague with C. Quirinus, had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was besieged. But while they strongly resisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Consul having sustained some inconveniences, and become in want of necessary provisions, was assisted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuse. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewise hate their associates of Rhegium; he was likewise moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to preoblige them to future benefits, as occasion should serve.

The City being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Consul dismissed upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fled thither as to a sanctu-ry, were put to death: The Legionary soldiers were carried to Rome that the Senate might pass Judgement upon them. Herein was shewed a notable Example of publick severity, for Seneca decreed, first, They should all be secured in prison, and afterward, be led to Exsecr. Val. Max. 2.9 For when M. Fulvius Flaccus, Tribune of the People interceded for them, declare, 15 For of their Forefathers, The Senatours persisting in their Resolution neglected the clamours of the Tribune, and Justice was accordingly executed upon the guilty. But left by so severe an act they might contract an odium, and the sorrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if such a multitude should at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty, first scourging, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies should be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Dacius Fabellius (who had lived unto that day, after the Frontinus littera: 4.4 Loss of his fight, that he might die with the more griefe) took away his own life in prison. Following the greatest number of Authors I have reported the whole Legion, even four thousand men, to have been beheaded in the Market-place at Rome; but I think it more probable what is related by Polybius, That but three hundred of that Legion came alive into the Polib. 1. 2 Roman power, that the rest, at the taking of the City, desperately fighting, chose rather to be slain, as well knowing that after such heinous villainies, nothing could be expected upon surrender, but more torments and a cruel ignominious death. The City of Rhegium with all its former Rights, Laws, and Liberties was restored to the ancient inhabitants, as many as could any where be found or enquired out.

This act of Justice did much increase the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no lesse Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their armes had caused fear. In the Consulship of C. Genucius, and Cn. Cornelius there was war with the Sarinites, a people of Umbria, inhabiting the Apennine Mountains: By what reason provoked, or in what hopes trusting, they now opposed the Formidable power of the Romans (those writings which are remaining making no mention) I am not able to Divine; Likewise the whole Proceedings of the war are utterly lost, and of the memory of these things, nothing elsie come to our knowledge, but that Cn. Cornelius Triumphed over the Sarinites. Plutarch reported there was a most sharp winter in these Consuls time, in so much that the Sap being chilled, Trees withered, That Tiber was covered over with deep Ice, and that the Cattel perished for want of Fodder; Zonaras 483 Columna Ca- so great and vehement was the coldness of the air, that monstrous hills of snow lay unmelting the Market place for forty daies together. The thing being unusual in that Climat, and by many my look upon as a Prodigie, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being long after much encreased, when Q. Ogulnius Gellus and C. Fabius Pictor being Consuls, many frange unheard of sights were seen, and many more reported. At Rome the Temple of Salus 484 Aug. de Civ. a carcass half eaten into the City, and being themselves feared by the noise of men, left it in the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

At Fo-mii the walls were said to be often struck and cast down with thunderbolts; and news was brought that in the Calenian fields, the earth opened, and fire suddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to ashes, infomuch that not only all the fruits on that place were blasted, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. These things caused more feare then misery, but that a War was made against the Picentines, which being the next year finished, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurisdiccions. Now in the City began the Coining silver, (their wealth being encreased by their victories) whereas before Brasse only was used in all Exchanges; but then pennies and half pennies were made of silver, which went for ten, and five pounds of brasse; from their value called, Sestercius. It was called, Moneta, because it was coined in the Temple of Juno, to whom that Name was given, by reason the did Movere, that is, admonish the Romans when in the War of Pyræus and the Tarentines they Consulted about their wants, Sextus in That money would not be wanting to those, who observed Justice and prosecuted Wars. The Con- Sextus in moneta Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now possessing a certain Cattle, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, stirring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were scarce well composed by the last peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long remain near the Frontenae, where the Romans assaulted a well fenced place, the Receptacle of Lollius his spoils, and from great hopes falling into as great fear, did at length obtain the Victory Moon-thy night and the Townsmen murthering themselves together upon the tumult, when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their sight: This accident was great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Passages, in so much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much loss) when on a sudden the snow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to Vic.

Tacitus 1.1.12.6 ward their Taxes and Customs encreasing with the Commonwealth, there was a necessity of 489 doubling the number. Appius Claudius who in the time of his Magistracy was surnamed Caudex, Agellum 17.11 and M. Fulvius were Consul the year ensuing, which was very memorable, in that then first began the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily. Then first brake out Hostility between two most potent Cities, which after many years, after many bloody overthrowes given and received, could not at length be ended without the utter ruine and destruction of one of them.

But, before we enter upon the History of the War, it will be necessary to relate something of former times concerning Carthage; for in the ensuing Narrative many things will occur, hard to be understood and judged of, unless both the Original and increase of that City be first known.

B O O K V I.

H A T Carthage was built by the Tyrians of Phœnicia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners both clearly testify. 'Tis reported that Elissa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agenor the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred she bore to her brother Pigmalion for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sichæus) entred that Creek of Africa, and possessed that Peninsula where Carthage was afterward built: her small beginnings promising little:

hopes of so great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained: For he believed Dido purchased no more ground than might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender things contained a larger space, than the fellers did imagine, and it was sufficient whereon to erect a Castle, which from thence is thought to be called Bryta. Afterwards seeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick sake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men forrich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkened to the counsel sent from Vtica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phanicians in recompence thereof should pay a yearly Tribute.

The work being finish'd, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthago, the Greeks call'd it Cartheda, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthage. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Indulgent people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increas'd. These things seeme to have beene a faine (seventy years) before the foundation of Rome; for about for ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Eliza her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. Parbas a Pettit King of some African Province, fought to marry her, threatening upon refusal to raise war against her. But as she was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chastity and love of her former husband, so she very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if she had at length overcome her own Resolution, and were inclin'd to marry the African, caus'd a Pile of wood to be erected before her intended marriage, wherein to sacrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her husband Sichæus: And after many Sacrifices offered, she did at length alight the pile, and killed her self with a sword the brought with her; her love to her Husband and Sub-jects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddess, with this Temple in the place where she died. Silius Italic.

[illegible]

Neither did a lesser crop of misery spring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers were cied by mutual conuance exercise Extortion and Purloin the fate without punishment; for that 'tis the lesse to be wondered, that a war arising between these two Cities, the Romans proud conquerors, when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick Stock, and the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were prey well born withall, afterward for a while the greatness of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the lesse sensible, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happines that ever attended Carthage. Their first beginning in Arms was againt the Africans, requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on; neither could they exort that right out of their hands but by many battels, whereby they enlarged their Empire, and the best planted part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the seas gave them the

Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two molt potent Citizens on each hand had with molt sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troubled with no War abroad (unless in his first year) not assaulted by any Treason at home, he died being above ninety years old, his fences being at that age entire and his body found, as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Estimation both with the Romans and Grecians ; when he would often have davelled himself of the Principality, the Citizens did openly prohibit him ; And his son Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his lifetime, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, shewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he choise rather to ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hiero was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedegree from Gelon an ancient Tyrant of Sicily) exposed to the mercy of the world ; forasmuch as he being a Noble man was shamed to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being delitute of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, put together honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground. Hierocles being much affected with this Prodigie, and the answers of the Southlayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was pre-

Interpretation, with grief and sickness cast down, when the next day among other horres, he espied that his son rode upon in the field, conjecturing thereby his death, he resolutely pulling the cloaths and plasters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understanding their overthrow, grew full of despair, and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerours, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparian Islands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiero's Victory, fearing lest (the Mamertines being utterly vanquished) the Syracusan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians, came suddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his Victory, and hindering him from directly marching to Messana, did himself make first entrance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possess them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a strong Garrison of his own souldiers amongst them. Hiero understanding himself by this craft deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult, returned to Syracuse, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an universal acclamation saluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the consent both of the Citizens and others of the Island without.

When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of resuming confidence, began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two Factions; some thought it not to be disputed, 'But that they should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which was for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Garrison, 'was little less than necessary. On the other side 'twas said, 'The Carthaginians were no less enemies to the Mamertines than Hiero, that without doubt their purpose of defending of the City was not out of good will, but desire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by loss of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own state at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possess the greatest part of Sicily itself. That 'tis therefore no way expedient to desire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them than they could fear from the Syracusans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preserve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be dismissed, having done the work: But if they have some other clandestine design, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendship. That they should rather implore assistance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and sincerity, who will have neither occasion nor opportunity of keeping Messana under their jurisdiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy secure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Messana strong as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather than any other Nation; that indeed they could neither with honesty or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succour and relief. For the Mamertines before their last battle with Hiero, beginning then to distrust in their own strength had craved assistance of the Romans as their Kinmen. And the people being persuaded by the Consuls who were desirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them; but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did defer it. For they who had lately so severely punished their own Legion for the wicked surprize of Rhegium, if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly lose the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former aid they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow, and not doubting but if they were forsaken by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one consent they ordained to lend them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as foreseeing that otherwise Messana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to pass, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy.

For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the insatiable desire of Rome in those who are potent, as by the convenient situation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two seas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that these Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the sea; whether the grounds being low were easily overflown, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the Isthmus. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, because things which are broken, are by some such word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are said to have built a Citie on the adverse shore over against Italy, which because it was situate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I believe, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both those words in the several Languages signifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island, Which was by many called both Zancle and Sicilia.

This

This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulness of Soile, yielding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the best, adorned with the Havens, and situation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chief seat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary side divided from Græcia by the Ionian sea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage alleged, yet the only cause of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, without doubt, the great desire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, That the Carthaginians contrary to the league had assisted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians But to great a power were now both these Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as to some bignesse betwixt one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at full growth entering both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot nions, desire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents. To these causes may be added the great power the Commonalty had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar sort did much prevail for gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Sicily to recompense themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their sentence who perswaded the war. Hiero assisted, overpowering the votes of those who stood to old Rules without delay sendeth Claudius a Tribune of souldiers beforehand with some few ships, to observe an opportunity, and if his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater fleet of Carthaginians, he entred as a fishermen's vessel and crossed over to Messana; there discoursing with the Mamertines as the present occasion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his business. But while after understanding there was a dissention at Messana, some pleading against the Roman assistance, the greater part bearing ill sent purpose told them, His coming was only to set the City at liberty, which when he had effected selves for the liberty of a City which was under their jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines should not be compelled to be subject to the Syracusans: That therefore he might depart, or else give some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudius denied, The City was free so long as a Foreign Garrison continued therein contrary to their pleasure.

To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, 'Tis plain, saith he, by this your general silence, that the Carthaginians cause is unjust, and that the Mamertines are detesters, if they consented with the Carthaginians, having no cause to dissemble, would freely and openly speak their minds. At this there arising a kind of a noise in the assembly, many praising the present, sufficiently moved by their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to pass over; but being much inferior to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of vessels, and skill in sea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a sudden storming nothing terrified with this misadventure, he new trinned his ships, resolving upon a better opportunity once more to make trial of Fortune: When behold messengers came from them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hanno's desolation complained, That they had by force attempted to sail in those seas which were in the possession of the Carthaginians; and furthermore perswaded them to have a great care of preserving peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unless they would withdraw their force out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That he would not suffer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that sea. Nevertheless he could not not prevent Claudius, who observing the Nature of the sea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without opposition. There calling a Counsel of those Mamertines he found in the Haven, he persuaded them, To call Hanno to them, as if they had some business at present to consult with him about. For Hanno, not much confiding in the Townsmen's doubtful minds, had with the souldiers possessed the Castle, neither was he willing to trust himself in any of their Assemblies: Yet fearing if he betrayed his Diffidence he might encrease their complaints, and by his absence give them occasion to joyn with the Romans, he came to discourse with them, where the time being spun out with dispute and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and call him into prison. So being circumvented by craft, and frightened with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to refore the Mamertines their Castle, and draw away his Garrison. The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the business, were above measure exasperated, and (whereas otherwise they used to punish their Commanders for evil counsels though they prospered) exclaiming both against the folly and cowardize of Hanno, miserably crucified him, and immediately sent both sea and land forces to Messana with another Hanno, the son of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Lybeum, marched to Selinus, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Argigentum, and (having fenced the Castle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms against the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp, Embassadors came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, thought this the fittest season wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and also the Barbarians in possession of Messana might be driven out of Sicily. Having therefore had discourse with the Carthaginian General, they easily agreed to enter into confederacy against the Romans, who had supplanted both to their equal losse, each of them having failed of their hopes of Messana: 'twas ordered they should jointly besiege Messana, and suffer no part of Sicily to be subject to any power but the Carthaginians or Syraculans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his whole strength moved against the Mamertines, having first sent an Herald to charge the Romans, if they would be esteemed friends of the Carthaginians to depart Messana, and within a time pressed to quit Sicily. The ships were commanded to keep their station about Pelorus; the foot army fortified their Camp at a place not far from Messana, called Cubilia, in the Greek tongue Evoia. Hiero likewise, according to agreement, came with his Syraculan Army, and laid siege to the City on the other side, about the Hill Chalcidicus, for the Castle, being round begin, could not safely receive succour either by land or sea.

About the same time, when the Herald brought back no peaceful answer from Messana, the Carthaginians, partly out of anger, partly out of distrust, cruelly put to death all their Mercenary souldiers which were Italians by Nation. These things were no sooner heard at Rome, but the Consul Appian was forthwith sent with a strong Army to Rhegium, thence he sent some before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Hiero about breaking up the siege, in the mean time, seeing the seas so strongly guarded, he was very solicitous and intent in contriving how to cross over with the least danger. The Consul's Embassadors brought back no friendly answer from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate oration sharply reprehended, he first having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed saying, 'I am in doubt, Romans, whether I should grieve for my self or for you; I indeed have lost friends of your somewhat worse than I took you to be, but ye have lost that Reputation of Justice and Integrity for which ye were so famous among all Nations. With the Mamertines ye never had any friendship or society, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entered into one with Me. Being now willing to breake these Leagues, can ye give an account, by what injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are thereunto provoked? But because the Carthaginians are able to speake for themselves, omitting what concerneth them, I shall at present put you in mind of things in reference to my self alone. The Mamertines your good Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syraculan Banners, and being dismissed for their Returne for Italy, after they had been entertained as friends and Companions by the poore credulous Messanians, committed a most horrid fact, as hath not been remembered by man, slaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, wives, children and the City it self. Which unless your selves (being of the same opinion with other men) had judged to be a most vile and execrable villany, you would not so severely have punished the self same fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegian, by the Mamertines Example. By the same indigotie therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge of wicked villanies, by the same am I moved not to let the Mamertines goe unpunished, especially seeing they have since committed so many Robberies almost all Sicily over, by what it were the memory of their first offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other things) in that they destroyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syraculan protection, is reason sufficient why I should with a just and pious War prosecute the boldnesse of such most injudicious Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them because, being born in the same Italy, they are as it were your kinsmen, how much more justly might you have spared the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegium I helped you with Auxiliaries and Provisions, how should I possibly then Divine that ye would hereafter hinder hinder me when I should upon as just causes besiege Messana? But what need I use many words? if you have any care left of your reputation and faithfulness, if any sense of honesty, at least if any shame, I thought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather assist me in my just cause than oppose me. But if the consideration of these things seem light unto you, however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis most certain all the world will plainly understand you. That the Romans were incited to base actions against us, not out of any colour of Justice and Equity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or doing this Noble Island to their Empire.

When this answer was returned, Appian having observed that so strong a Navy guarding the passage he could not without manifest danger cross over, plotted a very subtil and cunning device, he said, He did by no means desire that Hiero should be alienated from the Romans, that the day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ships prepared for the voyage as if he would sail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syraculan souldiers in the Rhegian Port, under the pretence of being Merchants, and it hapned accordingly as he had foreseen for he no sooner had entered into what he would make any Sea-ship day, and sailed along the Italian shore, but presently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the seas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the passage open, failing themselves likewise away whether it pleased them. The Consul, who had forethought it would be come to pass, feared his course backward in the night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body so much as observing, much less hindring his coming.

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskilful in sea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuilt ships through a sea dangerous in it self, though it had not been dark, nor any enemy to be feared: And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to Posterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Consul. For, because he made use of many vessels, made of the Trunks of trees, for the transportation of his souldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the simplicity of that age firmamed Caudex, which signifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Romans having no use of sea affairs, had neither any covered ship or long boate, or good skiff in a business of such concernment as this was; but made use of those Trivemes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little vessels of Traffick of fifty Oars. But Appian landing not far from the place where the Syraculans had pitched their Camp, Encouraged his souldiers and declaring to them, The Victory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to assault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the sudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready; for a time the fight was very sharp, the Roman horsemen were beaten back, but the Legions stoutly standing to it, Hiero was overthrown, and with his men fearfully retreated into his works. Appian having commanded the dead bodies to be plunder'd, entered into Messana, freeing the Mamertines from great fear, and filling them with better hopes for hereafter. Hiero seeing himself beaten before he could see the enemy (as himself afterwards confessed) and suspecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the passage over the sea, when he had revolved many things in his doubtful mind, began to be in fear of the main chance and in the dead time of the next night he drew his army out of their Trenches, and marched directly without halting to Syracusa. When he was gone, Appian thought fit to make use of the terror of his late Victory in vanquishing the Carthaginians also, and having ordered his souldiers to refresh themselves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day to assault the Carthaginian side the sea, on the other side deep Marishes and Bogs encompassed it in the form of a Peninsula: That narrow space of ground where was passage to firm land was fenced with a strong wall against all assaults. Here the Roman souldiers beginning the storm, could not prevail against the strength of the place and multitude of defendants, but being beaten back with darts and stones (as in the storm of a City) they were forced to retire without having done their work.

Many times it hapneth in war that ill success in the beginning giveth occasion of better fortune, while they who are worsted endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their losse, and the enemy on the other side being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, came to pass to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulged the enemies, issued out of their Camp and pursued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not so much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtue and courage.

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were slain, some fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about; neither durst they any more stir out of their place as long as Cladius was at Messana. The Consul, considering the nature of the place Zonaras, and difficulty of its situation, thought it no wisdom to make a second assault, and seeing his time

Valerius placed upon a Pillar in publick near the Rostra: He also on the side of the Court built by Hostilius set up a Table, whereon was painted the Battel wherein he overcame Hiero and the Carthaginians, which before his time was not done by any man, but afterward by many. This Valerius had his Surname Messalla from Messana; but I wonder that some Authors of no small note should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the series of affairs does evidently demonstrate, that it rather proceeded from his delivering that City from the troubles it sustained (after Appius Claudius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, removing the one enemy and reconciling the other.

In the mean while the Pestilence still raging, a Dictator was named for the knocking in of a Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn. F. Cn. N. Maximus Centumalus, he chose for Master of the Horse Q. Marcus, Q. F. Q. N. Philippus. In the same year the Æternian Colony was planted, whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as some will have it to Castitum. After this L. Posthumus, L. F. L. N. Megellus, and Q. Manilius, Q. F. M. N. Vitulus were created Consuls, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought sufficient, because now having Amity with Hiero the war was more easie, they considered likewise that provisions would be the better procured if the Army were but small. The Consuls having transported their forces into Sicily, and being joined with their associates, passing by things of lesser moment, thought fit with their whole strength to besiege Aggrigentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furnished with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they seeing Hiero had forsaken them, and that the Romans made Sicily their chiefest care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the first place therefore they sent the greater part of their forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait against the Italian shore, by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least to compel them to send the smaller forces then otherwise they would have done.

But being frustrated of their hopes (for the Romans had strength sufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coasts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary soldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spain, whom, together with great plenty of provisions, they sent to Aggrigentum, resolving to make that their Magazine of Corn, and the Receiptable of their Armies, being, by reason of its convenient situation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for such occasions than any other City of Sicily of their Jurisdiction. The only seat of War therefore being about that City, the Romans, having confined the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and because they foresaw the siege would prove long, the soldiers sent out to reap and bring in Corn, wandered somewhat too far and more carelessly then ought to have been done having an enemy so near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make use of this occasion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had lost by their negligence. For, when they who were sent out to forrage were not able to resist the assault of the Enemy, the Carthaginians pursued them even to the Camp, where deviding their forces, some prepared to storm the works, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times, the Laws of warfare duly observed and the incorrupted Rigour of the Roman Discipline saved them from an hazard tending to the destruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cause whatsoever to forsake their station) the guard without, knowing it was to no purpose to fly back, though they were much overpowered in number, maintained the fight with wonderful courage, losing many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arme themselves and come to their Relief, so the Enemy being there repulsed, and those who had now almost entered the works surrounded, the Romans made a very great slaughter of them, and pursued the rest even to the City. This accident made both the Enemy more fearful of issuing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not so great as before, (for the Carthaginians seldom made a sally, and then only in manner pickering and light skirmish) the Romans thought fit to divide their forces, and plant their Camps on two sides of the City, on the one side near to Æsculapius his Temple, on the other in the high way leading to Heraclea. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both sides, toward the City, against their Sallies, and toward the Country both to secure themselves from any invasion, and to hinder Relief from entering the City. The space between the two Camps was guarded with many companies of soldiers.

In all these affairs they were much assisted by the Sicilians, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand. They brought provisions as far as Erbessus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it into their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this stay the siege continued for almost five months, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the work on't. For a great number of men, little less than fifty thousand warriors, having been so long shut up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelihood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the passages, so that they were much afflicted both with their present misery, ferie, and expectation of future. Therefore Hannibal the son of Gisco (who was Commander in chief at Aggrigentum) by many messengers craving relief against hunger and other dangers, Hanno the elder was sent into Sicily with some Elephants and Soldiers which were for that purpose raised. His Army consisted of fifty thousand foot, six thousand horse, and three score Elephants, with which forces he sailed to Lilybæum, thence he marched to Heraclea, whither forthwith came messengers promising to deliver up Erbessus to him: Being by their means made effected a business of great moment, as much assisting the Romans now for want of necessities as they had done the Agrigentines.

And now the Romans began to consult about raising the siege, which they were very near giving over for a desperate business, had not the King of Syracuse, by trying all ways, made a shift by stealth to convey to them some corn and other commodities, whereby their present want was in some measure relieved. Hanno considering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and lusty and in perfect strength, therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heraclea, he sends his Numidian horsemen before to play about the enemies Camp, to provoke the Roman horsemen, and, if possible, to draw them out into ambush. The Numidians according to order carelessly flying about the Consul's Camp, the Romans issue out, beat back those who opposed, and pursued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanno to be coming. The further they followed the pursuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works inasmuch that many of them were lost after they had met with fresh forces, which caused those who fled likewise to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placeth himself upon an hill called Torus, about a mile and a half distance from the Roman Camp; nevertheless the battel was deferred longer then was expected between two Armies so near one the other; sometimes the Carthaginian, sometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battel, while Hanno was desirous to fight, the Romans contained themselves within their Trenches, because they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and chearfulness, being themselves terrified and dejected with the losse their horsemen had sustained.

But when they, (seeing their associates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthaginians than endure such want) were resolved upon the Battel, then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus spent; nothing of greater moment being performed, but light skirmishes which happened every day. At length being moved with frequent entreaties from Hannibal, who had daily sent out Messengers, and by lighted fires given him often notice, that the besieged were no longer able to endure hunger, and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanno was resolved no longer to defer the battel, giving order to Hannibal at the same time to issue out of the City. The Consuls having intelligence hereof, kept themselves very quietly within their Camps; Hanno the more furiously presents himself in Battel array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulse the enemy from their Trenches, neither ranged battel against them while they stood, nor pursued them when they retreated. When things had been thus transacted for some dayes together, and the Carthaginians were fully persuaded the Romans durst not venture on any further action, L. Posthumus the Consul wisely made use of the enemies security and contempt to his own good. For silently ordering his whole battel within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their custom came up to the works, he issued out with a few and held them in action with light skirmishes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themselves, he brought forth his Legions and made a charge upon them.

Hanno, though he saw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, stoutly entering into battel, maintained it doubtful till the day was almost spent. But the Romans, having on purpose well refreshed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battel, being weary with fasting and standing all day, the longer they fought, were the less able to resist by reason of the weakness of their Bodies. At length the Mercenary soldiers who stood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in disorderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battel and caused successe in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the greater losse, and forced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty thousand men came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the same fortune, for of eight an Army very few escaped with their General to Heraclea; they who were shut up in the City, seeing no way or means of safety left them, were afflicted with very great terror and despair: When Hannibal following the best counsel his ill fortune had left him observing that the Romans, with what weariness of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, kept not the guard, so he tricked as heretofore, about the third watch of the night went out of the Town with his Mercenaries, and having crossed the Trenches filled up with beats stuffed with straw (which he had beforehand prepared for this purpose) he was a good way on his journey before the Romans, at break of day perceiving what was in hand, a fortified part of the hindmost Troops; Hannibal with the rest betook himself into places of security. The Agrigentines seeing themselves forsaken by the Carthaginians, either out of anger, or to curry favour with the Conqueror, slew many of those who remained in the City. The Town was not therefore saved from destruction, above five and twenty thousand Free-men were sold into slavery.

slavery. In this manner was Agrigentum taken, in the seventh month after it had been first besieged, to the great profit and glory of the Romans, but with the expence of much blood, for of the Consul's Army and his Auxiliaries, there perished by several means above thirty thousand during this siege; for which cause, and by reason of the same, These Commanders going to Rome in hope could be undertaken, they returned to Messina, C.M.F. Flaccus, and T. Otacilius, C.F.M. Hope of Triumph, the next year L. Paterculus and Sicily. The Carthaginians having let forth a great Navy Craffus being made Consul went into Sicily, thought thereby to divert the Consuls from the care of Sicily, but they having sufficient guard upon the coasts to repel the invaders, did nevertheless pro- cress over into Sicily, where they received many towns which yielded themselves to their pro- tection, being deceived by the late example of the Agrigentine overthrow. The Carthaginians in the mean time made no resistance, for besides their late ill successe they were vexed with the Edition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mustiny for want of many moneths pay; for the punishment of whom, Hanno devised this stratagem, first soothing them with fair speeche; he deities them, At present for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes of suddenly surprizing a very rich town, by the plunder wherof the Gauls should be sufficiently As- sisted, both for their pay, as also for the forbearance of it. Having by this mean to treat with the appeased them, and moreover received thanks, he takes a convenient time to treat with the Carthagi- nians, who were not far off, and says to them, I have sent for Scipio, Otacilius the fierer, (who was most faithful to him) That he would, as a Ruegado, first to Scipio, Otacilius the fierer, under pretence of having perverted his Accounts, and inform him, That next night he might circumvent four thousand Gauls, who would come to Entella to take it with the help of some Troians within.

The Consul thought he gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a bulineſſe apt to be neglected, did ſend a Choice Brigade of ſouldiers upon the deſign; the Gauls came accordingly as they had been deceived by Hanno, and the Romans ſuddenly ariſing out of ambuſh to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gauls were ſlain and becauſe they died not unrevenged, Hanno was doubly polluted, both that he was rid of his inſolent Muteeners, and that he had cunningly puniſhed them to the no little loſs of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, Mincius the Prætor propounded in the Senate, the bringing of the water of the River Anien to the City; which work M. Curius the Cenſour had deſigned out of the enemies ſpoiles, but ſeveral impediments ariſing, the bulineſſe for nine years deferred, was now again conſulted about; and two men appointed as ſupervifours, Curius and Fulvius Flaccus, but Curius dying within five days, the Glory of finiſhing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the ſame time Hamilcar came from Carthage into Sicilie as ſuccellour to Hanno. For the Carthaginians, when Hanno returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominy, fined him in his fix thouſand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being deceived by the likeſells of Names, have delivered, that this Amilcar was Father of Hannibal who managed the ſecond Punick War againſt the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilcar the Father of Hannibal came into Sicilie with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great force prevailed, that the acts of another leſſe known Amilcar were aſcribed to Amilcar Barca the moſt Noble and Egregeous of that Name. Hamilcar therefore the ſuccellour of Hanno ſeeing the Romans far stronger then himſelf in their land army, durſt not aſſault any In-land Cities, nor depend out of the Mountains and difficult places into the Campaigne: but having a ſtrong Navy whereby he was doubleſs Maſter of the ſea, made diligent uſe of ſailing his Forces, and, having ſent Hannibal againe to plunder the Coaſts of Italy, himſelf ſtole about the Sicilian ſhores, eaſily recovered many Port Townes which had joyned themſelves with the Romans. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Romans eaſily taking and defending the In-land places, the Carthaginians the Maritime, the Feare and hopes were on both ſides very equal, and it was hard to judge to which of theſe two Nations the Victory of the whole War would enſue.

FOR THE FIRST TIME IN THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES, the Supreme Court has ruled that a state may not require a woman to carry a fetus to term and deliver it, even if the fetus is viable. The decision, handed down on June 30, 1992, in Roe v. Wade, is a landmark ruling that will have far-reaching implications for the rights of women and the role of the federal government in regulating state law.

HOUR years were now expired since the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battle, both over Carthaginians and Syraculans as often as they durst encounter: They had taken selves; but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves free, did not only molest and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the shore, but likewise wasted the coasts of Italy, both to the losse of the Roman Empire, and likewise to the disgrace; whereas the African throne was clear and free from the enemies invasion. Polibius. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently consulting upon the matter, did resolve to pretry their fortune at sea also. This was the very first serious thought the Romans had concerning sea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had conceived it with Wildom and Resolution: Inlomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by sea to encounter a people most awful in sea affairs, wanted neither Boldnesse to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Constancy to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither had any one Man of War of detaken the design, they did in a very short time both learn to sail and venture to fight and overcome those people who for many ages had experience in sea affairs.

The care of building the ships was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Asina, Ompis. and C. Duilius, who had newly entered the Consulship. They had one Carthaginian ship of 437 five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to pass Lucif. de viris over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came near the shore and was grounded upon the Lucif. c. 37 sands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Paternæ and to diligently prosecuted the work, that in threefore days after the timber was felled, they had threefore ships standing at Anchor. But the Consuls halted there the timber was felled, they wit, then by their Industry, For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilcising men on purpose) they contrived a device, which though it may at first seem ridiculous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Commendable. That, while the ships were in building, their Men should sit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For in the middle of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were failing.

By this exercising themselves in fancy onely they were so improved: that when the ships were ready, after a few daies real paines-taking, the Confuts were willing to trust themselves and the safety of all their Legions to their care. When lots were cast for the Provinces, the Land Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him seventeen ships, sailed before hand to Messana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered suddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to pass by the cunning of Bodes, Hannibal's Vice-Admiral, and his own Credulity, giving credit to some Liparaans, who were suborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of taking the City of Lipara by Treachery. There being circumvented by the Carthaginian ships, he nevertheless resolved to encounter them, and seek his safety by fighting; but that Bodes by another fraud, trained him and his Colonells into his own ship, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no sooner come but clapt up in chains, the others being hereby terrified did without blows yield themselves up; Bodes gaining all the Vessels sent the Prisoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consul's incogitancy did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had understood that the Roman Navy sailing by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Desiring therefore, as neer as might be, to observe it, that he might accurately know the number of their ships, their swiftness, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessels were in, he sailed forward with fifty ships, not foreseeing any danger, his ships being confusedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any safe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, suddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and sailing in good order; he was vanquished before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lost the greater part of his Navy, himself likewise being in great Danger, he very hardly escaped with the rest. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his misfap, sent Messengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off. There while they diligently considered the inconvenience of their own Vessels, that they were rudely made, and farre inferior to the Carthaginians in swiftness, it came into the mind of a certain ingenious man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies ships; which Engine they afterward called a Raven, or Crow; the fashion of it was this. There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ualues long, some nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pully or windlass, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fixed a bridge, six ualues broad, and four feet long, made of planks fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the space of four ualues, even the whole length of the Timber. The other part of the bridge or ladder, which was not inserted in the Timber, being of two ualves long, was so fastned by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall, to the end of the bridge was affixed a strong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pully of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredeck; Then as they listed, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatsoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Consul C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoiled the Region of Mylære, sailed with his whole fleet to that shore.

The Carthaginians were glad of this, assuredly promising themselves victory over Inland-men, altogether unskillful in sea affairs; whereby they became an example, That so Enemy whatsoever ought to be despised, as to cause one to remit ordinary discipline, and grow careless. Hannibal the Admirall, who had conveyed his Forces out of Agrigentum, was in a Vessell of seven oars on a side, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhus, the other ships followed him: not as to a fight, in any distinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making halt to their despicable Enemy. But, when approaching neerer, they saw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman ships, wondering at the novelty of the business, they passed a while, at length the most Courageous men laughing at the rude invention of an unskillful Enemy, the foremost ships with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down, into what ships soever they light, so pierced the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills. The Roman soldiers, if the ships were fastned side to side, did on every part leap in and assault the Enemy; if they were joynd only in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with so much the more facility, because on each side of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure: They who went foremost, holding their bucklers before, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, those who followed held their shields down to the little fence, so guarding their sides, and entering the Enemies ships; so that the fight was not performed with the beaks of ships, but with swords and hands, like to a set Battell. The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an easy victory over men lightly armed, and trusting more in the nimbleness of their ships, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships among which the Admirall's frigate was taken, but Hannibal leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat escaped Captivity, and sending a trusty friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capital punishment which otherwise had attended him. His friend entering the Senate, as if all things had been well, well, asked their Advice, whether they thought it fit that the Roman Navy should be fought withall? and every one unanimously agreeing, That there was no scruple to be made, and that the business should not be deferred, he told them, 'Tis already done, and we are beaten; wherupon, no body daring to accuse the Fact, wherof every one in his own Person would have been Author, Hannibal escaped the sentence of Death, but was deprived of his Admirallship. The rest of the Carthaginian ships, (for the greater part was left) after the Flight of the Admirall, were very much troubled and doubtful in Council what to do; they were ashamed to set upon the Roman ships they were afraid, by reason of their Engines; At length falling round about, and finding on every side the foredecks of the ships opposed against them, with those formidable Engines, having used all the art they could, they despairing of the victory went with seven thousand men, three thousand having been slain. With this success did C. Duilius Orosius 4. 7. fight with the Carthaginians neer the Liparaan Islands, where the Romans got much prey, but Florus 2. 2. much more ample Glory and Renown. The Consul taking charge again of his Land Army, Zonars. 1. 1. 138. Marched to Segesta, and delivered it from danger, it having been brought even to the utmost extremity by the Carthaginians: after that he took Macella by storm, Hamilcar never daring to encounter with him: and so having confirmed the mindes of the Associate Cities, Summer prosper. For sixt the Romans after seven months continuance were faine to raise their siege of Musistrum, having lost many men before it. When afterward a Diffusion arose between Dialer the Romans and their Auxiliaries, and that the Associates encamped themselves apart between Edage 232 Paropus and Therma: Hamilcar thought fit to make use of this their madnes, and falling on them unawares slew four thousand of them: and it wanted little but that the whole Roman Army had likewise been involved in the same overthrow.

Then again many Townes were taken by Hannibal, some by force, some by Treachery: which though it was no good news at Rome, yet the loss was counted small in respect of their Navall Victory. For the Roman courage having already approved it self invincible by strength by sea all. Whereupon wonderfully encouraging themselves as to the whole Warfare, they judged the Author of this their New Glory worthy alike to the whole Warfare, for was the first who ever made a Navall Triumph, which was on the Intercalary Calends over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Navy. They likewise bore with him, when, not coming from supper, a light Torch was carried before him while the Mintrells Sang; A Beaked Livie Epit. 17. Pillar likewise was by decree of the Senate erected in the Market-place, of white Parian Marble, which is yet to be seen (but many of the Letters worn out with Age) containing the Number of ships taken and drowned, the Summ and Weight of the Money taken. There were taken of Gold three thousand seven hundred pieces, of silver above an hundred thousand, of heavy Bras seven score hundred thousand pounds. The Triumph being accomplished, Duilius called an Assembly, wherein L. Cornelius, L. Jo. Cn. N. Scipio and C. Aquilius M. Navy. The Admirall had permission, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Sardinia and Corfica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ships be

This was the first Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corfica; the Islands are so near adjoining that they seem but one and the same, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, so in the Dispositions of the inhabitants. Sardinia as bearing the shape of a mans foot- Sals Hist. 2. 1. for of Hercules of Lybia much frequenting the Island, gave it the name it is now known by. Brest-plates they sew together the out skins of their Rams, which they call Musones, bearing not wool as others, but in stead thereof hair like Goats. Their chiefest City is Caralis, looking towards Africa and from thence built, with a very fair Haven. Corfica is not to be compared with Sardinia either for largeness of Territorie, or for Riches, yet is thought to be the third in bigness of all those Islands. The inhabitants derive the name from one Corfo a woman, out of whose Head a Bull crossed over into this Island from Liguria; the Greeks called it Cyprus. It is Mountainous and Rugged, in many places almost impassible, and the people like to the earth are very rough, without ordinary civility, as untractable as the wild beasts. When they are taken prisoners they hardly grow gentle, but either out of impatience of labour and servitude kill themselves, or by their contumacy and stubbornness are troublesome to their masters.

The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter taste, much like the flower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholesome, and many think your Corsicans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocæans, and Nicea of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the seas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished than tamed, they bestowed themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewise corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to sow or plant any such thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius steer his course, and first in Corfica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the rest. From thence as he sailed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where seeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well situated, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and sailed home for a recruit of men.

About the same time a servile Commotion, in the City, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afflict the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then four thousand in Rome, most of them Samnites; these men abhorring the sea, did secretly bemoane their own Condition and so far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the City and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erius Potellius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he feigning himself engaged in the same faction, was made privy to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but only to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunity of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswaded them, That when the Senate next met, they should come by hands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that they should have occasion offered of executing their Purpose, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and stirs. And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not only a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own dissimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, sent Messengers with good words to pacify the Rout, and command them home, assuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redress of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspirators, thinking their Designs was still kept close, went their way: The following evening Master bound his servants, whom according to Potellius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or sickness was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into Sicily so soon as ordinary, whereby Hannibal after his last Victory had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Dræpanus, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Eryneis thither to Dwell, whose Cite, left it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelihood of conquering all Sicilia, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forsake the Island, tarried to oppose him. The other Consul had an Easier Task with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of strength, he found Hanno there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. The battel waxing

ing vehemently hot, Hanno courageously fighting, seeing his own party worsted, rushed in to the thickest of the Enemies and was there slain: After which the Town yielded it self. The Consul much graced the fame of his Victory by his singular humanity toward the Enemy. For he took care to have the Body of Hanno to be conveyed out of his Cabbin to Burial, and made a large Funeral for him, laying aside hatred after Death, and rightly judging that virtue is to be honoured even in an enemy. Then not suffering the Terror of his late Victory to grow stale and be forgotten, he took many other Cities of Sardinia, furthering his Courage with Councils and stratagems. For he used in the night time to land some choice bands not far off those townes he meant to assault, who conveniently placing themselves in Ambush lay quiet, till the Consul coming to the walls and giving an Alarm, had under pretence of Fight drawn the Townsmen a good way out of their works, then they in Ambush hastily arising took the Cite void of Defendants: By this wise he obtained many places, and so prosecuted his Atchevements, that the Carthaginian armies had no abiding place either in Sardinia or Corfica. For which cause, at his Return, there was no doubt made, but a most ample Triumph decreed him, which he made over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Corfica the fifth of the Isles of Mare, having brought great store of plunder out of those Islands and many thousands of Captives. But in Sicily C. Florus besieged Mysistræus, which was attempted in vain, neither could it be gained till the new Consul A. Atilius A.F. C.N. came thither. For to him was allotted Sicily for his Province, the Navy was committed to his Colleague C. Sulpicius L. F. Q. N. Paternulus. They understanding that Pannorus was the Carthaginians winter Quarter, marched thither with all their Forces, and, ordering their Men, presented Battel to the Enemy, but no man coming out against them, they went thence to Hippæa, which Cite in their journey they stormed and presently mastered. Thence Atilius marched to Mysistræus, which being stoutly defended, at length the Garrison soldiers, being wearied with the cries and Lamentations of women and Children, forsook it. The Carthaginians went out in the night time; at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Inconmodities they had endured in the siege thereof, flew every one they met without distinction of age or sex, till A. Atilius the Consul caused proclamation to be made, That both Plunder and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Covetousness overruled and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into very great danger, for want of knowledge in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them had first possessed the higher places, and as it were besieged the Romans rashly entered into a disadvantageous vallie, every one thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Caudine overthrow; but the wisdom and Valour of M. Calpurnius Flaminius a Colonel in the Army, in their utmost point of despair did relieve them. For he following the Example of P. Decius, who being a Colonel in Saminius had done the like, taking three hundred soldiers along with him, went up to possess a certain Hillock, not out of hope to escape, but both he and his soldiers being animated with the Love of honour, and desire of saving the whole army; 'Tis said when he had brought them thither, he thus spake unto them, *Let us die, fellow Soldiers, and by our death drive the Legions now roundly besieged. And so it came to passe, for while the enemy converted themselves wholly upon these men, they being resolved to die, did so long maintain a sharp fight with the greater number, that the Consul had time to expiate himself out of that unhappy place. The Carthaginians having slain those who did indeed on purpose offer up themselves (putting no hope in their ambush which was now discovered) departed. The fortune of Calpurnius was next to a Miracle, for he being found among the heaps of his own and the enemies dead bodies, was the only man had breath left in him; and being carried off from his away and diligently fomented (among many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful service to the Commonwealth, and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among the Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not have known how to have bestowed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor: M. Cato apud But being a Roman all the reward of such an exploit was a Garland made of Grass; nay, they were so negligent in the memory of the very Fact, that the name of this valiant man is scarcely known: Most Authors call him Calpurnius, but M. Cato calls him Q. Cædicius; Claudius Quadrigarius gives him the name of Labrinus. But the Consul being freed from those straits he was in, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the greater courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City, and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiero. With them he brake down the walls, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for the most part he sold for slaves. Thence he marched to Enna, and had that by treachery delivered to him; the Garrison soldiers were part of them slain by the Romans after they were entered, the rest fled away and betook themselves to places possessed by their own party. Sittana was obtained not by craft but courage, the defendants being driven back and the City stormed. Some smaller Towns in that part of Sicily made no delay, but forthwith sent messengers with promise of submission. The Consul placing Garrisons in all places convenient, marched into the Agrygentine Territories, and by treachery had the Castle Camicus delivered to him. Where-*

Whereupon the Garrison of Erbesus being disheartened, forsook the Town. So Erbesus came again into the Romans hands. The Consul encouraged with this success, and thinking that many of the Liparens favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City. But there he had not the like Fortune. For Hamilear having intelligence of the Romans Design, privately entered Lipara, and diligently expected the time of Action. The Romans being ignorant of this, boldly and unwarily coming up to the walls, were by a sudden fall of the Carthaginians beaten back. Many were wounded in that Conflict, and no small number slain. In the mean time C. Sulpicius the Consul had many encounters with the Enemy in Sardinia, and all prosperous. And his mind was so erected, that he made bold to sail toward Africa.

The Carthaginians by no means enduring any such Attempt, once more made Hannibal Admiral, who since his flight out of Sicily had continued at Carthage, along with him they sent their best Sea Commanders, with Order, Tochus the Enemies Navy from their Country-here. He puts to Sea with a resolution to fight, but a Tempest prevented the Encounter, which being very violent on both Navies, drove them against their wills into more calime places: Both Admiralls fortuneed into Sardinian Ports. There lying at Anchor, Sulpicius to draw the Carthaginians out to sea, suborned some, under pretence of Runnagates, to periwade Hannibal, that the Romans were again sailing to Africa. He being deluded by this Craft, suddenly setting sail, before he was aware, met with the Consul, who in a convenient place waited for him: Many Carthaginian ships were sunk, before they knew what they were about, the Consul's stratagem being much favoured by a Mist opportunely arising: At length understanding what was the matter, the other ships went some back into the Haven, others drove themselves on shore, where the men landing themselves, most of the Vessels were taken empty: Hannibal despairing to recover the Port, betook himself to Sulci, where, in a sedition, being apprehended by the Carthaginians, who had fled out of the same fight, he was by them Crucified, saying, that his Folly and Rashness was the cause of their Overthrow. But this Victory of the Romans was an occasion of some loss to them afterwards. For being freed from fear of the Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and securely waited the Grounds, they were suddenly routed by an unexpected incursion of Sardinians and Carthaginians, one Hanno being Commander. C. Duilius was this year Consul, and built the Temple of Janus in the Herb-Market. After this two Triumphs were made, the one of C. Aquilius Flavius Pro-consul over the Carthaginians, the fourth of the Nones of October, the other of C. Sulpicius the Consul over the Carthaginians and Sardinians, the third of the Nones. When C. Atilius M. F. M. N. Regulus, and Cn. Cornilius L. F. Cn. N. Blaesus again were Consuls, the Senate ordered Sacrifices to be made for avoiding the Omens of some Prodigious. In the Alban Mount, and other places, and in the City it self many stones fell as Haile: 'Twas thought fit to Solemnize the Latins Festival, and in order to that, a Dictator was created, Q. Ogulnius L. F. A. N. Gallus. The Master of Horse was M. Latorius M. F. M. N. P. Mancianus, C. Atilius, the Admirall having sailed to Tynderides in Sicily, when he espied the Carthaginian Navy passing by, out of order, suddenly resolved to set upon it: And commanding the other ships to follow, hastily sets forward with ten, which were Ready, and with all speed both of sail and Oar endeavoured to overtake the Carthaginians, still before him. Hamilear, a very considerable Commander, was in that Fleet, who seeing but few ships near him, others scarce yet out of the Haven, the greater part still at Anchor, steering back, circumvented Atilius and his ships with his whole Navy, nine of them he sunk presently, not able to maintain fight with so great a Number. The Admirals Frigate being better manned, and the Mariners encouraged by the presence of the Consul, broke out from amongst them by main strength and saved it self. For the other Roman Vessels were now come up, by whose help the Fortune of the Battell was changed, eight of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, ten with all their men taken; the rest steered to the Liparens Islands. These things were done at Sea. The Land Forces were not so quick at their Work, having in vain assaulted the City Lipara: But with all hostility they spoiled the open Fields, the same Calamity also attended the Island Melita, not farre distant. For these Exploits C. Atilius the Consul made a Naval Triumph over the Carthaginians. The same year M. Atilius for the Pro-Consul Triumphed over the Carthaginians of Sicily the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The Romans were then in a very joyfull state and Condition, being Victorious not only at Land, but at sea also: And did now begin to Consul not only of the Conquest of Sicily and the Neighbouring Islands, which they thought sure enough their own; but of invading Africa also, and bring the Terror of the War to the Gates of Carthage it self.

BOOK VIII.

Afterwards L. Manlius, A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter upon the Consulship, and L. Cæcilius, Q. F. Q. N. after whose death, M. Atilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been sometimes Consul, succeeded in his Office. Then only in this year Africa, which hitherto had been free from any miseries by an Enemy, began to be sensible of a war, when the Romans had made an invasion therein to, after they had in a great Sea-fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians fleet, which exploits, as they were achieved, we fill in this Book set forth, and both the one and the other frume of that same Regulus, and his end not suitable to the gallantry of the man. The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Atilius being Consul, did so strive to get the best in a Sea-conflict, that when they had lost many ships, they first gave over fighting, yet because they had sunk some certain of the Roman Vessels, they would not take themselves to have been of lesser reputation; On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vast multitude therefore the Consuls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Messana, with an Armado of three hundred and thirty ships, and from thence passing by the Coast of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having also some Forts near the Hill Ecnomus, they sailed forward. And about the same time Hamilear General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and sixty ships, having passed by Lilybæum in Carthage, and then Hiraclea Mineas, in that bay they consult of calling Anchor, observing the motions of the Romans, and if they durst bend towards Africa, they were in a posture to stop their course; which when the Consuls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance; that they might not be to seek for Counsell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw home whither for safety: therefore committing the ships to some of the flower Soldiers, they make four Squadrons, as so many parts of the whole fleet; the choicest men they set in the first Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in the order, in the Rear-guard they put their choicest men for strength, the Triarii, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 300 rowers, and six score Souldiers. So the Muller Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men.

The Carthaginians did somewhat exceed that number, leading more souldiers then an hundred and fifty thousand. And indeed the Consuls did scarce esteem of any other sort of souldiers in comparison of their own. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the swiftness of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell array against that danger; finally they consider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They set two Gallies wherein the Consuls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this side the first Squadron, on that side the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore castles of them all were turned outwards, and such evident reasons of that his judgement, that scarce ought to be more manifest; he shews them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joyning Battell, it was their manner not still to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would listen to his advice, he does assure them not his only of safety, but also of Victory. When severall of the Chief Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders also themselves, and with becoming modestly preferring the welfare of their Country before his single opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army should be committed to a foreigner; Xanthippus having undertook his charge, of his Army should be committed to a foreigner; Xanthippus having undertook his charge, and dayly drawing his souldiers out of the City, he does accustom the field Forces to observe and change their ranks, and instantly to do what they are commanded, and the confidence of better success does fill the souldiers with admiration of him, the whole City being cherishe'd even in desperation, is rais'd up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this U-derperation, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their souldiers as opportunity did require, they march out against the Romans, even with almost twelve thousand Foot, with four hundred horse, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they saw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their first design, avoiding all steep and craggy places: But being puff'd up with pride through their constant felicity, they let at nought the souldiers that were wont to vanquish, and Graculus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that fawning poyson of fortune waiting on him. When he well considered that he had routed the Sea Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almost two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand men, and that Carthage being fore streighten'd, might be enforced to surrender, he denied them peace when they sued for it on reasonable termes, and wrote to Rome, That the very Gates of Carthage which he had begirt did tremble at him. So also moderation hath often deserted great Spirits in prosperity, then constancy in adversity. But the Carthaginians having pitcht their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whose chiefest strength was in his infantry, and thither he could not be followed but over Mountainous and steep difficult places, thinking it all one to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to trust himself in the Camp, even to the greater wanting of his confidence, passing over the river that was in the midlt, and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indifferencie of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promised the Carthaginians; for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching, where his heart could with them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because if they now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if the should be overcome, they might make their escape the better in the night, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the pursuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians consulting what was to be done, Xanthippus calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lose such a singular opportunity he did earnestly perswade him to undertake the Battell, so much the easier, because the souldiers themselves crying out to Xanthippus, they did of their own accord with unuall cheerfulness desire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he draws out the Army, and does exercise them after this manner. A four square body of 8000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Chosen men of all their foot, was set for a reserve, before this body, a convenient space being left between, the Elephants are set in order, being drawn up as broad as that square body, on either Wing the Horse are placed, behind these on the Right Wing stands the main body of hired souldiers. The Army being set in such array, for the advantage of their own side, and when their darts, they should stand in open order, they should violently break out again from the Wings, main body should joyn with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and should on a sudden furiously flanke the Romans, when they were charging the opposite reserve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he saw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he soon takes advice, he brings his souldiers lightly armed to the Van, he sets the well Compact foot Companies in the Reserve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before, so that the chief danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champain Country, there was room sufficient for the Horse to surround, the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led against the opposite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shout, set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings; but there the Romans being much inferior in Number, not able to resist the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants, or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, pursued them to their camp. The rest of the foot had an harder taske against the Elephants, by whose vast bodies their ranks were disordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thicknes of the Battell hindered them from breaking through; till at last they were disfiled on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were broken by the Horse, the foremost which made it to break through the Elephants, were slain by

Enemy

Evenly standing yet Entire, and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the Fight, the Elephants and Numidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almost five hundred souldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army who beyond all Hope, by their halt, got safe into Cluspea; of the Romans and their Associates were slain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting beside eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Left Wing of the Enemy. When the Army returned to Carthage after so great a Victory, carrying the Roman General Prisoner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durst lately scarce hope for; late to near despair, giving not only their Country, but very City for lost; they durst scarce believe to great a Change, though they saw it with their eyes. But they took most special notice of the General, every ones eye and thought being settled on them, looking sometimes on Xanthippus, soetimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatness of their own Commander, by the so fast a General, so fortunate a Warrior, a proud Conquerour, an implacable Enemy, the his ancient Fame and Liberty together. Their Admiration was encreased by the habit and Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best looks, carried a large and virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art in flustering the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carthage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good; as long as their City being in safety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty loves to their Country: But where there is danger left they should bestow the same benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, than have him in the least way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themselves able to equal others, their envy is hidden and more remis, but when they see themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duely given to others which they desired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they seek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treachery: But a Native of the Country hath so ne remedy against this Evil in his Friends and kindred: A stranger being void of all helpe and assistance encreaseth the Malice of degenerate mindes by his being easy to be hurt, in that he is more exposed to Treasons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and considered these things, the sequel doth evidently demonstrate. 'Tis reported he was drowned by some sent after him from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Country was preserved by a Foreigner.

Others deny Xanthippus thus to have perished, yet confesse the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure allotted him an old ship, full of Leakes, fairly pitcht over as if it had been found, but that he discovering the Cheat, went aboard on another ship and escaped the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no less Treachery, but much more cruel, by reason of the number that perished thereby. The Mercenaries in somewhat tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Valour, were put into ships being made believe that in some other place they should have their Desire: But the Captains of the ships who had such private Order, landed them and left them in a Barren Island, where being destitute of all helpe from man, without food, without ships, having famine on one side, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perished, a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and that the Island was thereupon called Offender, or the Bone Island, it lieth in the main Sea beyond Lipara Westward. These deeds whensoever and howsoever performed, do nothing disfigure with the Carthaginians usuall Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Associates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily severe against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat tolerably well used, for they likewise had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against M. Regulus they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of ways; they allowed him food which was neither pleasant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the rest, they would frequently on a sudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus miserably handled, and brought low, they call him into the common Gaole.

and L. Manlius A.F. P.N. Vulsus, to these was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ships; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage the War in Sicily as Proconsul. 503
Polib. 1. 39

Asdrubal understanding that one of the Romans Generals was absent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long stood in Battell-array one against the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own souldiers who accused him of cowardice, he drew all his forces out of Lilybæum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuntian Territories, he invaded the shore of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortund, that the Proconsul, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, with the regrew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having intelligence that some of the enemy spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Assembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were least known, What they were, or what business they had at Panormus, found out the spies and seized on them. By them he underlood the enemies designs, and observing there was more rafhness then good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the works of the City, that so he might encrease their foolish confidence. Whereupon Asdrubal growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconsul regarded neither the loss sustained nor the disgrace thence redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians till they crossed the River Orestus, which runneth on the South side of the Town, and then he had contrived a sure and sudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to finish his fear, so he placed but few souldiers upon the walls, desiring that the enemy should not expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a sudden chance furthering the design: For Asdrubal Forded the River with his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with so much contempt of the enemies Cowardice, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of ditch or bulwark. Polibius

Thither the Suters and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank stoutly, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then did the Proconsul think the fittest time to send those his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that fill sending out by degrees fresh supplies, part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to sling their darts at them, and if they found themselves sore pressed to retire into the Trench, and thence come out again to a fresh charge. The mean Artificers and common rout he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and sing them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himself with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File times being overpowered in number retreated in good order, sometimes being assailed by supemulation to seem Authors of the Victory as well as Asdrubal, and advancing with their beasts, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a shower of Arrows flying from the wounded began to rage, and balking themselves with fire forever anger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and disorder'd whole companies of armed men. Frontinus

Whereupon the Proconsul crying, This is the time of the long look't for Victory, issueth out, and being fresh and in good rank had an easie victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great slaughter made both in the field and in the pursuit, their calamity being encreased by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them: For Diodorus many were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too hastily amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans resumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened with fear, that they cast off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army so long as that War lasted. Florus 2. 2

Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to be slain, six and twenty Elephants were presently taken, and afterward all the rest. first hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the rest. L. Metellus sent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation; for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hog-heads, fastening a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over. Spreading earth and durt upon them, and erecting walls on each side in the form of stables the Elephants otherwise very fearful of sailing by water, entered on them and were safely conveyed to Rhegium.

A druball from this overthrow escaped to Lilybeum, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now considering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lost except Lilybeum and Drepanus, that the Romans having again set out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembered M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them, and persuaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next desired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a business: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Galle, and desire to see his dearst relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus hath a wife and children at Rome, friends and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Cousin German now Consul, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pitted for his afflictions; if therefore he bareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in procuring, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design. He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alleging, The Customs of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Senate being accordingly assembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embassadors delivered his Message, That himself also being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from his Masters to propound chiefly, That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem fit to both parties, or that at least an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embassadors presently withdrawing, he likewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly solicited, would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians assented to it. Then sitting silent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself, Conscrip Fathers, I am still a Roman; my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the same. Following therefore the reason of my Soul, which is my own, rather than the inclinations of my Body, which is anothers, my advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners nor conclude a peace. For to restore the Captives while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my self who am an old man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some no way to be despised. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wisdom, so it is pernicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs can be transacted without great pains and cost: But if you rightly consider the state of Carthage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We were indeed once overcome in a great Battel, whether it were my fault or fortunes, but we have so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, pressed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, except one or two Cities, and in the other Islands their condition is naught. You have a Navy which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war ye are also superiours. And the losses ye have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath taught you Circumspection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Italians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they never truly loved, so have they of late learnt to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any such injury they revolted freely to me, but now since their former masters have waited their Grounds plundered their Cattel, exacted their Monies and slain their Nobles, what do you think they can more desire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Africa? But that your leavies of men are easie and large, that your souldiers are valiant, of the same Language, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great an advantage, that if in all things else ye were exceeded, this one only thing would be sufficient to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies side, for what help is there in a company of Mercenaries against such a force? and if there were any, the Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as difficult to hire strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingratiously and treacherously used, is sufficient warning to others how they lend their assistance to such a people who know not how to recompence the greatest desert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest

* Barbarians, a Brutish and slavish sort of men, will be deterred by Cruelties so often exercised upon their Fellowes, who have been sometimes murdered by hangmen, or their fellow Soldiers, sometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited Islands, receiving instead of the pay they have fought for, most inhumane punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conscrip of Prisoners granted.

This Council displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himself for the Common good, the more they prized him, and manifestly inclined upon any termes whatsoever to restore to Gallant and Generous a Person to his Country. And voices were given out, that seeing he was now so happily returned from foreign Captivity, he might lawfully tarry in the City, or be detained there. Frontin Metellus in Euripidum. High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But he to the Amazement of the Senate, it selfe, with a fierce Spirit, and severe Countenance, proceeded, saying, Why do ye not resolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in vain attempt that which will be neither pleasing to your selves, nor profitable to the Country, 'not honest in me. For suppose, for a while ye would be willing and joyfull to see me amongst you, when once the short spurt of this affection is vanished, the Balenest of my Return will make me more odious to you, then my absence made me desirable. For my part I am resolved not to live in that City, where after an African slavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an honest Citizen, and if I should desire it, my fidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of an sacred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I assured the Carthaginians of my return. And should I forswear my selfe, I fear that Revenge Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Punishment be affronted by the Perjuries and Contempts of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be absolved, that the bookes of the Angurs mention expiations of such crimes, and that Attorneys understand the Majesty of the Gods is more severe, then being offended by Perjury, to be appeased by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reason, that a Guilt contracted by the sins of man, should be washed away with the blood of Beasts. As for my selfe, I am not ignorant that great and exquisite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a trust, I think to be worse then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Torments they hurt only something about me. Think not that man miserable who is able to endure evil, but now by a long custom they have left off to be troublesome to me. That they are tolerable, I have learnt by suffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other calamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not death, which is easie at any time to obtain, and truly I had inflicted it on my selfe, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcome sorrow then to avoid it. I have spoken these few and consuled words, that ye may understand, I am not to be persuaded from my Opinion, and withall that you should not bewaile me as an unfortunate and miserable Man: My Resolution is easie and constant: 'Tis my care to return to Carthage, what I shall there suffer I leave to the Gods.

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, that before he was dismissed from Carthage, they had given him a gentle Poison, which by slow degrees feeding on his vitall spirits, should consume him after the exchange was made. Wonderful was the constancy of this Man, who, rather then suerve from the Rule of Honesty, did with more earnestness pursue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them, a true and profitable Lesson to posterity. That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are constant in their resolution, who have a sense of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onerous for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone so great miseries, if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great punishment for evil men. The Senate therefore having made a Decree according to the opinion of M. Regulus, he with a settled countenance followed his Sullen and angry Malters, by whom it appeared that they would cruelly revenge the indignity of their repulse upon his Person, informing him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refusing to discourse with his Wife, and his over him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refusing to discourse with his Wife, and his Children making Lamentable complaints, the Consuls said, if he carried they would not deliver him, the Embraces and kisses of his little Children, was carried back to Carthage, where with cruel torments he was put to death. For cutting off his Eyelids, they kept him awhile in a dark place, then in the heat of the Sunne they suddenly brought him out, and forced him to look up into the sky, at length they put him into a Wooden chest (right over against the Sun) full of nails on the inside, and so narrow that he was forced alwayes to stand upright; if at any time he leant on one side to ease his weary body, he was pricked and goared with the nails, and so in torment and continual watching yielded up the Ghost.

This was the end of M. Atilius Regulus, much more glorious then his Life, though long led with with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincible Spirit, and for his Counsell not to be despised, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accrue him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after to the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egregious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful constancy at his death, being more happy in suffering calamitie then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death, and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marcia and her children, whom they shut up in an Engine thrust through with sharp irons, resolving to put them to the like death as Regulus had suffered; for five whole daies they had no food allowed them, in which Bostar with grief and hunger pined to death; Hamilcar being stronger in body continued five dayes longer, shut together with the carcase of Bostar, with sustenance sufficient only to prolong his miserable life. Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Ashes of Bostar should be conveyed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjustly offended, nor able with security to offend, with horrid punishments extinguished that virtue they ought to have revered; the other mitigated a most just revenge not regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh illustrious Empires.

Erymologus in Kapod. 6.

UPON the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors the Consuls having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incensed against the enemy for M. Regulus his fake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconsul. For they measured not the greatness of the business so much by the losse of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the losse of an Army and so many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the soldiers, having successfully fought against the beasts, did now no more stand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Consuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred ships, and four Legions failed to Panormus, where taking in likewise of the other forces and ships (unless what were left for the guard and security of some places) they went to Lilybaeum with 240 Beaked ships, threefore Barks of a shorter size, called Cremas, and many other vessels of all sorts, with resolution to make an assault upon it. This is that famous siege of Lilybaeum, which beginning the fourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years, and at length was ended, neither by the surprize of the City, nor with its surrender, but together with the whole War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well understanding of what concernment that City was, either to the Guard of the African Coast, or the Empire of Sicily, did with all their might, the one assault, the other defend it. The Triumph of L. Metellus did somewhat comfort the City of Rome, after their sorrow for M. Regulus, not only with the memory and consideration of their successes, but with the sweetness of Revenge also over so cruel and confident a People: He Triumphed Proconsul over the Carthaginians, the seventh of the Ides of Septembris, thirteen of the Enemies Commanders were led before his Chariot, and a great troop of Elephants, even an hundred and Twenty; some reckon many more. These being afterwards produced when the Games were celebrated, were chased up and down the Circus with spears headed with iron, that the People might accustom themselves to contemne these beasts they had heretofore so terribly feared. Virgilius Flaccus affirms they were all slain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Present of so considerable a strength to any Prince. The same year Corn was very cheap at Rome, a bushell for a penny, at the same price was sold a gallon of wine, thirty pound of dried figgs, ten pounds of oil, and twelve pound of flesh. For there was greater store of these Commodities then of money, which by the long continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Consuls in Sicily assaulted Lilybaeum with all their strength, and the besieged as stoutly resisted. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood farthest toward the Lilybaean sea, this being demolished, they did by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed six. For the more easy battering of the rest they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Engines. Though the labour were very great (for the ditch was threefore cubits broad, and forty deep) they did readily set upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians hinder their design, made holes on the inside of the Trench, out of which they cast the rubbish again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground, (by reason of the multitude of Labourers) they changed their Counsell, and erected another wall within the former: Himilco being at all Workes indefatigable, who besides the multitude of Inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance and constancy elude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men, not any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, sometimes he issued forth, fighting with such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes slain little fewer, then usually fall in set Battells.

The Romans undermining the Foundation of the Walls, Himilco made his countermine over against the place where he observed the Romans to cast out earth, and opening their Mine he sent in forthwith a Band of Armed soldiers, who set upon the naked Romans busie at work, and slew a great number; and as many were burnt with brush faggots (thrown into the Trench and set on fire) while they approached the Walls to help their fellows. Notwithstanding feare and confirmation of mind encreased among the besieged, whereby some Mercenary Commanders taking advantage, and pretending want of pay, plotted to betray the City to the Romans, nothing doubting but that they could easily induce every man his soldiers to approve of the design. On a certain night therefore slipping out of the Town into the Roman Camp, they declared the state of the City, and what they had intended; Amongst the other Mercenaries at Lilybaeum, there was one Alexon an Achaian, a Man not unskillfull in Martiall Affaires, and of singular Integrity: He understanding the Traytors design, without delay discovers it to Himilco, Himilco as in a great and imminent danger, immediately summons together all the Mercenary Commanders, who were yet in the Town, declares to them what was in agitation, and by whom, and vehemently inveighing against them, he exhorted those who are present, not to become partners in the rashness and Treachery of others, that persisting in their Duty, they should find all fair dealing from the Carthaginians, their Pay should be certain, and great Rewards moreover accumulated, that if they tainted themselves with the infamous crime of Treason, they would be accountable to God and man; withall, as much money as in halt and fear he could at present raise, he distributes among them, promising that, himselfe would take care to see the Common soldiers pay off as may be discharged.

An Oration made in season, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speaker be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon; Every one assented to what Himilco spake, and cheerfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their soldiers in their Duty. Himilco commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply himselfe to his own Company, and endeavour to keep them in Subjection: He sendeth likewise along with them Hannibal, the son of Hannibal, who resided in Sardinia, and Alexon the Achaian; Hannibal to the Gauls, with whom he was acquainted, and very gracious, by Reason of his former conversation with them in the Wars; Alexon to other Mercenaries of severall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. These engaging their Words, that whatsoever Himilco had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the business, that the Traytors a while after returning to the Walls, were not only kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Consuls without effecting their Design, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily bestowed on them.

Thus did the fidelity of Alexon at that time support the Carthaginian Affaires, brought almost Cicer. de nat. decur. 2. 3. command, because they had profaned the Rites of Religion; for 'tis said that L. Junius did likewise feel the Indication of the Sibyls. They fled therefore to a new and unusual Refuge, and created a Dictator to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any one so impowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Infolence of P. Clodius the Consul was then very notable, and almost incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictator, he named M. Claudius Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Sergeants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Country, by what losses he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a scoffe. Whereupon the whole Senate being justly incensed against him, he was forced to resign up his Office, and was referred to the censure of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condemned, but others have observed, that when no Question was to be made but that the People would condemn him, he escaped by a sudden chance, a Storm then arising which dissolved the Assembly. And it seeming hereby that the Gods interposed themselves, they thought not fit to ordain any other meeting for the purpose. But Glycias being forced to disclaim his Office, in that the City was ashamed to see a man of mean rank to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheless admitted to all Spectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus was nominated Dictator, who made L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus Master of the Horse, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. These two went indeed into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his cross fortune, and desirous to wipe away the blot of his shipwreck, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of some within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promises. Eryx is the highest Hill in Sicily except Etna, situate between Panormus and Drepana, in that part of the Island which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy towards Drepana. In the top thereof there is a Plain whereon standeth the Temple of Venus; therefore called Erycina, the Richest in all Sicily, just under the Top of the Mount, in the midst of the Ascent, is a City of the same name, very hard to be approached unto, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow passages from the foot of the Hill. L. Junius therefore well understanding the nature of the place, appointeth a strong guard both upon the Kidge of the Mountain, and likewise in the narrow passages below, being very safe himselfe, and having the advantage with much ease to repulse the Enemy. He also encompassed Erycinus with a wall, and strengthened it with a Garrison of eight hundred men. But Carthalo landing his men there in the night time, stormed that Castle, and took and killed part of the Garrison soldiers, others escaped to Eryx.

The other passages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Historians, some affirm he was taken by Carthalo at Erycinus; Others, that he killed himselfe fearing to be condemned for the loss of his Navy. There is no less uncertainty whether the Scenar Sports were celebrated this year, or fourteen years after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Consuls. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrows, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitful year, inasmuch as twelve pound of oile was sold for an Assis. In the mean time the Dictatorship being expired, or Atilius having resigned it up, C. Arelus L. F. C. N. Cotra, and P. Servilius Q. F. C. N. Geminus were chosen Consuls. The Consuls were pretty successful in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth. They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybaeum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Garrisons which were remote from the sea. Carthalo having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waste the Italian Coasts, that thereby he might divert the Consuls from Sicily, or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his designs. For the Prætor being sent out with the City-forces for defence of the Country, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpose.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinied for want of Pay, he exposed many of them in barren lands, and sent others to receive their Punishment at Carthage. The rest being incensed hereby, began manifestly to revolt, so that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilcar who succeeded Carthalo, coming in season, fell upon them in the night time, slew some, and drowned others; the remainder submitting themselves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. This is that Hamilcar surnamed Barcar, one of the best Commanders Carthage ever bred, and indeed without compare, but that Hannibal was his son. From this time the Warre began to be more difficult on the Romans side; For having suddenly assailed the Mercenaries, he failed to Italy, and in very great compals spoiled the Lorrian and Brutian Territories.

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuse very constant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and society with him. In the interim Hamilcar being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it is called Epirite, an Hill craggy and full of cliffs on all sides, exalting it self from the circumjacent Region to a very very great height; The top of it is not sharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable soil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from sea, and void of all harmful and venomous creatures. Therein is a certain hillcock which supplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that sail from Drepanum and Lilybaeum to Italy, with store of fresh water. There are three ways of ascending this Mount two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilcar plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midst of affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well seised the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succeed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a great emulation of Hamilcar's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealths cost out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Heratompis, and having obtained the City, sent three thousand Hostages to Carthage; yet they had some alay of this their prosperity. For L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus being the second time Consul, and Nam. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butus being his Colleague, a Navy was built at the charge of private men, which waited the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had again resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely restore those ships which were built at the publick Charge, reserving the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was set out very considerable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and assailing Kings: Hippo, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counsel they devised a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for sailing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and so the Fore-Deck being lightened Stern likewise slid over, and they had free liberty of sailing, having delivered themselves from the imminent danger.

After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The Roman Consuls divided their forces, L. Metellus besieged Lilybaeum, and Nam. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lieth an island, or rather a Rock, which the Grecians call Pelias, he Columbaria, which the Consul stormed in the night time, and slew the Carthaginian Garrison there. Hamilcar, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay but at break of day set forth to recover the place again, which the Consul observing, being not able to relieve his own men, with his whole strength assaulted Drepanum, whereby drawing of it in besieging Drepanum, he kept the island in possession, and afterward made much advantage because the Walls of the City were weakened on that side, he there began his assaults. But the thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it unfit, lest it might give an occasion of the like. For Hamilcar, having his Camp at Epirite for almost three ing before Panormus was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they of a main battel having many hinderances, especially because their forces being equal and their which the party worst might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in fight some were Drepanum was besieged, the Carthaginians Fleet infested not only the Sicilian but the Italian shores; and Hamilcar plundering as far as he could, waited the Italian territories even to Cuma, and the Sicilian lights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange of Prisoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of silver for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the money accordingly.

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Asulum the other at Alifum. There was likewise a Lustration made at Rome (being the eight and thirtieth) by A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus, and A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Atticus being Censors; and there were rated two hundred fifty one thousand, two hundred twenty two, whereas in the former Lustration there were found little less then three hundred thousand; so great a number of Citizens were consumed by War and Shipwrecks. Nevertheless the Sicilian army was duly recruited, the supply being by the Consuls M. Octavius C. F. M. N. Crassus (the second time Consul) and M. Fabius C. F. M. N. Licinus. These had a very buis and difficult warfare, but not being able to dispossesse Hamilcar of his strong holds, they performed nothing memorable. Which happened likewise to the succeeding Consuls for the same reason, as likewise because new Generals (being on the sudden every year elected against an old experienced Command) spent more time in making their preparations, chusing their ground, and insinuating themselves with the soldiery.

diary, then was left for the management of Affairs. It was therefore this year concluded (when the time of assembling the people drew nigh) rather to choose a DiCtator then to real-ize either of the Confults out of Sicily. Ti. Cornelianus Ti.F. Ti.Nepos was chosen to summon the Assembly; he nominated for Master of the Horse M.Fulvius Q.F.M.N. Flaccus. In the mean time the two Tribunes of the people, C. Funderius and Ti. Sempronius appointed a day for Glandia the daughter of Appius Cæcus to plead her cause before the people, being accused, for detaining the Plays, and for having taken away the suffrage from the crowd of people, the let fall a wicked speech Oh! that my brother were alive again, and had Command of the Fleet.

There was hardly an Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognation or Affinity, so that she wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her house, the merits of Appius her father, the frailty of her sex; that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgment: Neither was now the cause for great why new customs should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majority of the people, but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alleged, What an impious and execrable speech the hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is there any need of Witnesses, she her self confessing it; neither indeed can she deny it if she would, because she spake openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letters of the Law, shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it. 'Tis objected, That it is unusual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why it is unusual likewise for a woman thus to offend: Neither hitherto did any Commonwealth ever afford to wicked and impudent a woman. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent, being desirous that (offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of against the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment, must of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would be esteemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth; who being skilful in the Laws cannot be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expressly made of women, yet in these words, If any One, and the like, both sexes are equally comprehended. What wonder is it then if we believe the Law against Treason to concern both sexes, seeing this very Claudius is an example that both sexes may offend against it? But they Extenuate the buffnere, and would have the crime seem feign, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was wanting, she did not joyn her endeavours, counsels and actions with the Carthaginians; she did not raise Troops, arme Slaves, seize on the Capitol, nor actually with her hands effect that wickedness against the City which in words she expressed: Notwithstanding this, the Laws provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counsels and designs also; if indeed a mad man or an infant do hurt to any, the Law layeth no hold on their actions: yet the mind and intentions of others in many causes is made manifest by Words as by Deeds. She who made so detestable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it to pass? Unless we despise the Judgment of other men (which we have no reason to do) we shall find that in other places wicked wives are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for reputation of Wisdom exceedeth all Cities of Greece, there was a man whose office was to provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make great gains, which could not be unless a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any ambiguity wished Destruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is, if he had made it only for her brothers sake, for why should life be restored to him by whose means so many Citizens lost their lives? who no less affronted the Commonwealth by his Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Rashness; who being by the votes of all men precon- demned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment? Would you, if you were wife, have this man to live again, whose memory if you could hide in the same Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merits of their Brethren, so would he be a shame to you if any name or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though perhaps foolishly she hath desired her brothers company, if she did it out of any pious and charitable consideration. Yet, clearly absolve her, if the cause of her wish be not more abominable then the wish it self foolish and insolent. For why did you wish your brother alive again? that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kinsman, that his labours might redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None of all these. And what then? Even that he might command the Navy again: This, this wicked wretch, was the reason why you desired, as much as in you lay, to raise the Dead, to reduce Nature to its former habit, and unlock the Cloisters of the Grave that you might find a man by whom we might be destroyed! This is the Woman, Romans, whose impunity is craved by those who while they approve themselves good Kinsmen, regard not though they be esteemed ill Citizens. And truly no man is against it, that (according to their desire) ye should have mercy on her, had the had any mercy toward you. But seeing the hath wished the death of some, the grief of others, that they should be childless and fatherless, nay, the general calamity of all: who will be so foolishly tender as to judge her hostile, cruel, inhumane full worthy of any mercy? What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Censors upon the last Lustration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things these years last past succeeded prosperously, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very safe or good condition by reason the number of the Citizens was so much decreased. But this woman nothing moved at the loss of those who perished, therefore only grieveth because any are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, the wretched him alive by whose fault chiefly the number of Citizens is so small. But it may be said, The woman her self being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not pardon her crime for her Ancestors, for her Father's sake? Shall we then establish such a Law in our City, That if any man by any means do good to the Commonwealth his posterity shall have the liberty to offend it without punishment? Truly our Fathers were not of this Opinion, when they precipitated M. Manlius from the Rock, whereas the Capitol, the Romans last hope and refuge was, not by his Father or Grand-father or any of his Progenitors, but by himself defended from the Gauls. For favouring or assisting the Commonwealth there ought no other reward to be required but the confidence of the fact: But Appius, if ever he did good to the Commonwealth received abundant reward, being much enriched and full of honour, in which state he continued flourishing even to his last old age. Though perhaps it were safer not to make any mention of Appius and the former Claudii, then to put you in mind of those injuries, very high and bold ones, that Family (from its first Original never well affected to the people) hath committed against you. For what Appius is it they would have you remember, but him who always with an enemies mind, crossing your designs, chose rather to perish with his Army then be saved by his Colleague, being a Plebeian? who against the will of all the Degrees and Tribes perished in his Censorship beyond his due time? And now let them reckon up the merits of the Clandian Family, even from the time of the Decemviri, or from the first Original thereof, they shall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Ancestors in pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear she ought to be pardoned for their sakes. What cause therefore have these, or can any other man allege why this woman ought to go unpunished, unless it be feared the City should loose a woman of so good example? of which opinion if ye also are, O Romans, keep her, keep Clandia amongst you; that when our Matrons kneel at the feet of the gods, supplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, she may hinder their devout Prayers by her Curses; that while they wish for Salvation for our Armies, she may with Defraction; while they desire to fee the soldiers return safe and found, she may desire to hear they are vanquished, captivated and slain; that while they solicit the gods that few or none may fall in battel, she may repine and accuse Providence if any return home. Keep the woman, that as other Matrons provoke and encourage their children and kinsmen, in emulation of Illustrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, she may instruct hers by the example of P. Claudius to fight rashly, to run basely, wickedly to destroy the Citizens and arrogantly to have the Commonwealth itself in contempt. Let her propound these things unto young Nobles to be resolved upon from their Infancy, to be practised in their Youth; so let those men be educated to whom you must hereafter commit the charge of your Navies and Armies.

Such speeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People assembling in judgement, condemned them, in a fine of five and twenty thousand pound of heavy brass. With this and other fines, T. Sempronius the Edile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo and C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bnbus were made Consuls. There was a Colonie this year planted at Fregene, a Maritime City of Etruria, nine miles from Alifum whither one was led two years fine. These Consuls fought a very great Sea battell, the issue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Carthaginians lost a multitude of ships and men. And a tempest beavered the Romans of their rich spoils: In Sicilie affaires were managed with the same advice, and the same fortune as the year before; The Romans having an hard task not only by reason of the Cragginess of the places, but of Hamilcar his boldnesse and subtilty in martiall stratagems, whereby he so equally oppoled the Romans, that he not only defended what places he had possessed, and by frequent incursions vexed the Enemies associates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coasts; but minding other things also, did every where support the Carthaginian Power even ready to fall, being very indolentous, of a resolute minde, and of excellent judgement in takinge seasonable Counsells. Desirous therefore to relieve the Lilibatans from fear and want, being more closely beset by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main feare, as leering their Course to Lilybeum, which while the Romans failed out to Encounter, he slipped himselfe into the Haven, with some ships he had for that purpose placed where they could not be discovered, and so streightened and encouraged the beleaged with his presence, and abundance of provisions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilie, A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus Africanus and C. Sempronius T. F. T. N. Blaesus being againe Consuls, came and tooke charge of the Army. About this time the manner of their war was changed, not so much as ordered more closely and in narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountain, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural strength and situation of the place, with the help of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from fear of any surprize. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilcar, making any thing possible, which he lifted to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, setting forward with his forces, and without noisefcending thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprized the Romans unawares, and having slaine greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and severe, for Hamilcar being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself besieged by them below while he besieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, and for almost two years next insueing performe the office of most Valiant souldiers, For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an houre without alarmes and skirmishes, neither party all this while fainted or yielded, neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued equall and unvanquished, deligning in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea also.

Vellei. 1. 14. 8. This year a Colonie was planted at Brundisium, in the Salentine Territories, twenty years after that Countrey was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Cornelianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Caelius Metellus. The next Confulls were C. Fundanius C. F. Q. N. Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius C. F. Ser. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilcar was managed in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, onely the Mercenary Gauls, and others who kept Garrison in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavour'd to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Confulls, and these were the first Forreigners the Romans ever entertained into society of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilcar's virtue, who could neither be circumvented by craft, nor vanquished by Force.

Once more therefore they consulted about setting forth another Navy to Sea; For by no other means could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were mastered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was set forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continuall War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit feasonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth, so generous were the Senators, that in a time of publick danger they scorned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more money was raised than the building of a Navy required. Those who were richest did every man undertake to build a Quinguereme, setting it forth completely manned and armed; others according to their estates joynd two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this means two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hannibal Rodius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they relied with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these things were in doing, C. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumius A. F. L. N. Albinus entered the Confullship. A. Posthumius was then Priest of Mars, and therefore when he desired to call lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not suffer him, pronouncing it unlawful for a Priest to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unperformed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Senate likewise at the same time shewed a like Example of defending their Countrey's Religion, for they forbade C. Lutatius the Confull to ask counsel at Preneste, and manage the Affaires of the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Confulls could not be spared with safety of their Religion, and one seemed not sufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Pretors (this being the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lutatius, and it fell to the Lot of Q. Valerius Falto. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships to the number of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessels to the number of seven hundred, as soon as Winter was over, sailed to Sicily, whither being come, they find both the Lilybæan and Drepanitan Havens open for them; For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their ships. The Confull animated with this prosperous beginning, being by nature full of spirit, hating Idleness, and desirous of Action, besieged Drepanum, raising Workes against it, in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-souldiers, daily exercising them (as foreseeing sudden use of them in fight) in such as they who were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affaires and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encounter.

The City of Drepanum being fiercely assaulted both by Sea and land, and now reduced even to the utmost danger, part of their Wall being battered to the ground; It chanced that the Confulls

Confull Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, missed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even almost in their hands: Before the Confull had recovered the use of his foot, news was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of four hundred ships, stored with provision for their Army, with a very great strength of souldiers, and abundance of Armes and Money. Hanno, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Chief, his chiefe care was to get safe to Eryx, ease his ships of their burden, and so manning them with stout Souldiers from Hamilcar, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His design was well contrived, but prevented by the wisdom and circumspection of C. Lutatius the Confull, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ships were heavy laden, and encumbered with the burthen of their own provisions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ships with choice souldiers, he saileth to the Ilands Ægates, over against Lilybæum, where he discovereth Hanno coming from Hieroneusius; then encouraging his Sea-men and souldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of day he began to doubt, because the wind was arisen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himselfe. Weighing then the Reasons on both sides, he thought it safer to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ships laden, then suffer him to pass by to unlade his ships, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and also Hamilcar himselfe, who at that time was very formidable. Observing therefore the Enemies ships as they passed by with full sail, he setteth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men, causeth himselfe to be carried into the Admirall Gally, having not recovered the use of his limbe: signe of battell being given on both sides, Q. Valerius performed the Office of General, by reason of C. Lutatius his infirmity, not suffering to supply the place. The fight lasted not long before it plainly appeared on which side the Victory inclined; for the Roman ships being light and nimble, did on every side, at their pleasures assault the Carthaginians, being heavy, and almost immovable; they were likewise in every thing else superiours, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatsoever heretofore they had found inconvenient, and harmful; Their ships were built after the best fashion, they had carefully laid aside all lumber which was of no use in fight, their Rowers were lusty, and well trained up, and they had a very considerable strength of Legionaries: All these were very great advantages toward the Victory. On the other side, the Carthaginian ships were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leaved, and their men negligent, as being in security; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it must needs be, where the difference is so great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians lost an hundred and twenty ships, seventy whereof were taken, with all the men, to the number of ten thousand, the rest upon an happy change of winde in the time of fight, escaped to Hieroneusius. This was that famous battell at the Ilands Ægates, as it is chiefly described by Polybius.

For other writers affirm, that seventy three ships were taken, an hundred and twenty five sunke, two and thirty thousand men taken prisoners, and thirteen thousand slain, the Prizes taken were very great, not only in Provisions and Armes, but in gold and silver also. Of the Roman Navy twelve ships were lost. 'Tis reported that from the beginning of the fight a fiery meteor was seen in the aire, threatening as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed against it, prefiguring the event which presently ensued. Hanno, with the rest of the ships which escaped out of the fight, except those which fled to Lilybæum, returning to Carthage, was put to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutatius the Confull went to the Army before Lilybæum, where, while his wound was in curing, he spent his time in taking an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how they should be dismissed. Thence he went to Eryx, where he fought Hamilcar with good success, having slain two thousand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, though their spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and meanes, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, so long as the Romans were Masters at sea, to supply their Army at Eryx with necessary accommodations; and, if that Army miscarried, they knew not where to raise any more souldiers, or find a Generally they durst confide in. Being by this Necessity driven into despair, they sent to Hamilcar, empowering him with full Commission to do what he himself should think fit or convenient for the Republick: He having hitherto performed the Office of an excellent General, did now no less behave himselfe as a good Citizen. For having duly and seriously considered all arguments on both sides, when he found there was no other means but Peace, whereby to preserve the Common-wealth; he sent Embassadors to the Confull to treat with him thereabout. The mention of Peace was not unweelcome to the Confull, for being now shortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any means hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that, of having finished the War; and to transmit that to his successeur which was in his own power to accomplish, and most properly belonged to him, he thought both unseafable and unadvised: He was the more forward, as being very well conscious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Countrey, after so many years continuall labour, should enjoy some rest. Wherefore after a long dispute of Articles on both sides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians should totally depart Sicily; that they should not wage war against Hierro, and the Syracusans, or any of their Associates; that they should forthwith without ranfome restore all Captives, and deliver up all Runagades; that they should in the fpace of twenty years, by equal portions, pay twothoufand two hundred Euboican Talents of pure filver: That the confederates of each party might live fecure and unmolefted; That neither party fhould exerceife any command, or make any public building, or raife any fouldiers within the others jurisdiction, nor admit the others affociates into friendfhip and confederacy. 'Twas added, that thefe Articles were firmly concluded, if the people of Rome would agree thereto.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Conful earneftly infifted upon it) that the fouldiers within Eryx fhould refign up their Armes; Hamilcar protefting, That he would rather fufcife himfelf and his country to deftruction, then yield to fuch a difgrace: Nevertheleffe he confcended, That every man at his departure thence fhould pay eighteen pence. Hereupon meffengers were fent both by the Conful and the Carthaginians to inform the Senate and People of the Conditions agreed upon. The people did not allow of the peace, but fent ten Delegates to take an exact account of all circumftances, who being returned, they heightened the Conditions, That the Carthaginians fhould prefently lay down a thoufand Talents, and within ten years after pay two thoufand two hundred, that they fhould clearly quit not only Sicily, but all other Ilands between that and Italy, that they fhould not fail in a long fhip either into Italy or any of the Romans Ilands, nor hire any fouldier from thence.

The Carthaginians, fo they might have peace, refufed nothing; Hamilcar, before the Articles were fworn unto, laid down his Command and went to Lilybeam, and from thence to Carthage, having approved himfelf, without comparifon, the moft excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counfel. After this manner was managed and finifhed the firft Carthaginian War, which lafted for four and twenty years with various chances and great loffes, but to the greater damage of them who at laft proved Victors. For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian fhips to have been loft, and feven hundred of the Romans, which is a great argument of the Romans Contancy and Refolution, that, not regarding to many loffes by fight, or fhipwracks fufained, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pains, and the poverty of their Treafury.

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Conful was prorogued, that he might fettle affairs in Sicily; thither likewife was fent his brother one of the new Confuls, Q. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, whose Colleague was A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Thefe did by their wifdom order the Province, and fetled all things in peace and quiet, defiding all controverfies and taking away all caufes of quarrels and tumults, which after fo great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They difarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilcar, as likewife the Gauls who had revolted from him, furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, becaufe, befides other offences, when they were in the Garrifon on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their feveral abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Cuftom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was fent to command and govern yearly.

In the mean time Embaffadours came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all refored without Ranfome, as many as were in Publick cuftody; they who were prifoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treafury. But unlucky accidents at home did much diminifh the joy of the Roman people. The River Tiber did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the firft force thereof wafhed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the Iundation continued many days) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which fuddenly beginning in the night time, and running through many ftreets of the City, deftroyed an incredible multitude of houfes and men; and, not content with private harmes, confumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it feized upon the Temple of Vefta; but then L. Cecilius the Chief Prieft, feeing the Holy things and fecret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himfelf worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midft of the fire without any care of himfelf, fo he might but refcue the Holy things which the Virgins had forfaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himfelf having his Arme half burnt and his Eye-fight fpoiled, befide the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Deereed, That as often as he went to the Senate he fhould be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Conful, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Propurator, having fetled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and Q. Valerius on the day before the Nones of the fame month. There was a memorable ftirre between thefe two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without difpute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory desired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catulus on the other fide alledged, That the leffer authority fhould not be equalized with the greater in the diftribution of honours.

The queftion being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to ftand to arbitration, Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduft? Catulus refufed not to anfwer him; whereupon Atilius Calatinus was chofen Arbitrator, who asked Valerius, Whether the Conful's authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in cafe they had differed in their confultation about fighting? and in cafe their Anguries had been different whether of the two ought to have been followed? To which when Valerius answered, That in both cafes the Conful's authority ought to have prevailed above the Pretor's; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus fpake, paffed fentence on his fide. But Q. Valerius, though he was call by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Anclius Cotta, and M. Fabius Buteo being Cenfors, made the ninth and thirtieth Luftration. There were numbered two hundred and threefcore thoufand Citizens, two Tribes being fupraddeed, the one called Felina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes was made up five and twenty, and fo continued. Sicily being now wholly fubdued, as much as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things feemed not only quiet but very fafe and fecure; when behold a fudden war, arifing from whence it was leaft feared, did for a few days atonifh all Italy both with the terror and fear of an Intellunc broil, as likewife with wonder at the fpeedy difpatch and ifue of it.

The Falifci, I know not upon what account, grew fo mad as to rife up in arms againft the Romans; but the Confuls being fent with the Legions quelled them within fix days, and reduced them to fubjection. In the former battel, for 'tis reported two were fought, the Victory was doubtful, for their foot prevailed though their horfe were routed. But in the latter the victory being on the Romans fide complete, caufed the Falifci to humble themfelves and beg peace, having loft fifteen thoufand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the loffe of their arms, horfe, houfhold-ftuff, fervants and half their Territories. Their City in whole ftrengh they confided was tranflated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The people of Rome were meditating a more fevere revenge, out of anger againft a City which had fo often rebelled, but reftraining their wrath by the advice of Papirius (who had written the form of fubmiffion by the Confuls own command) That the Falifci fubmitted not to the Power but the Faith of the Romans: And fo much did the facred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party to no feever punifhment then was agreed upon. This war gave occafion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Confuls; Q. Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Falifci, A. Manlius the fourth of the Nones of March.

Italy being now once more at Peace within it selfe, their Publick Pleasures, and Delights did likewise encrease with their Power and security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, C. Claudius A. P. F. C. N. Crispus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tullianus being Consuls, L. Livius Andronicus, in imitation of the Grecian Comedies and Tragedies, reduced the Stage Plays, which heretofore were only Satyrs into Fables, and feigned representations. The same year likewise gave beginning to another sort of sports. On the fourth of the Calends of May, the Floralia were instituted out of the Spyllis books, to avert the blasting of fruits and plants then springing forth. L. and M. Publicius Malleolus, Brothers and Adiles of the People did exhibit publick shews out of the Fines raised from Herdsmen who had fed their Cattel on Commons. The Magistracy of these Brethren was in another respect very memorable, in that they caused that Clift (which from them received the name of Publicius) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Aventine, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built the Temple of Flora in the great thew place.

These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a suspicion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a designe for War. That these Provinces therefore were assigned to the Consuls, and war was then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjecture, then a true History, there being no ancient writer extant which accurately describes those things; This one thing is Certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spolegium in Umbria. The next year also 'tis easier to say, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not shut, then to declare where or with what successe the war was managed. And the Consulship of Q. Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other passage then that Ennius the first Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius T. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius Q. F. P. N. Falso were Consuls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province fell to the lot of T. Sempronius. P. Valerius encountered by the Gauls, at the first with ill successe, having lost three thousand five hundred men: But, entering fight again he obtained a signall Victory, wherein fourteen thousand Gauls were slain, and two thousand taken. But, by reason of the loss sustained in the former battell, the Consul was denied the honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prosperous fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wise management of the business. For after the first fight, understanding that assistance was coming to him from Rome, he said, he had rather perish with all his Army, then obtain Victory by the helpe of others; and in this fury he cast himselfe and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T. Gracchus had better and more happy successe, for having overthrowen the Enemy in a set battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria: From thence he crossed over into Sardinia and Corfica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardinia Venales, whereby is signified any thing that is plentifull, and at an underrate to be sold.

But

But to confesse the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity, then a just cause of possessing Sardinia and Corfica. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troublesome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmost extremity; whereupon other their Hirelings, who were in a Garrison in Sardinia, flew to the Villany, they inveigled his Army into a society of Rebellion, and apprehending him, nailed him to the Crose, and having flung all the Carthaginians, they had possessed almost all the strong holds throughout the Island, till upon a falling out between them and the Sardinians, they were expelled the land, and betook themselves into Italy. Then did they accomplish that which they while they were in Sardinia they could not, for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Island: But being now present either by the importunity of their Entreaties, or by plainly demonstrating what an occasion was offered of encreasing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to sail over into Sardinia. For it is a virtue of no ordinary train, to ambitious men well or long dissemble their greedy desires: But 'twill not be amiss for the better understanding of this business, to relate some foregoing circumstances. The Romans, that they might gain the Reputation of Humanity, did in the beginning of this Warre, very much favour the Carthaginian cause. And, though they sent them no assistance as was desired, yet they refused to entertain the Uticans, or any others who revolted to them: They commanded their Merchants out of Sicily and Italy to accommodate the Carthaginians with all necessary Provisions, prohibiting all traffick with their Enemies, and gave licence of hiring men out of Italy for this war. They sent likewise Embassadors, though in vaine, to compose the strife: A little before there arose a controversy, because the Carthaginians had taken some Italian Merchants conveying Commodities to the Enemy, and secured them in publick Prisons, and they had now five hundred of them in chains, and having slain not a few, had cast them into the sea to prevent the discovery of the thing; whereupon the Romans declared themselves agrieved, and began to threaten War: But the Carthaginians restoring those whom they had in custody, so pacified the Romans, that they in answer sent back without Ransom all other Prisoners taken in the Sicilian war. Yet at length Ambition prevailed, with a desire to crush that People, with whom they had for four and twenty yeares together waged war with various successe, and foretold, that unless in time they prevented it, they must be forced to fight again. Wherefore when the Carthaginians, (having against their wills lost Sardinia, and now finished their war with the Mercenaries) mediation, and decreed, that War should be proclaimed against Carthage, unless they laid down their Arms, which they had taken up, seemingly against their Rebels, but indeed and really against the Romans. Whereupon the Carthaginians unwilling in an unreasonable time to undertake so great a War, did not only quit Sardinia, but upon the Romans demand, added likewise twelve hundred Talents of silver, to their former fine. This injury did most of all incense the minds of the Carthaginians, and is thought to be the only cause of that war which was soon after commenced, and prosecuted by Hannibal. For Hannibal's constant Hatred of Romans (to which the second Punic war is chiefly imputed) was not by any other means more hotly exasperated, or strongly fomented. But these things happened afterwards.

In the mean time L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Claudius, and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus being made Consuls had Gaul on this side the Po for their Province. That a Colonie was this year planted at Valentia, though many affirm it is no constant and general opinion, unless there be another Valentia besides Vibo, which Authors of better credit affirm to have been peopled fifty yeares after in the Consulship of Quintus Flaminius and Cn. Domitius Anobarburtion, but after they had divided their Legions out of greedinesse to waste more places, the Camp of M. Fulvius was in the night time assaulted and very hardly defended. The Gauls departing augmented. For the prime men of the Bui taking counsel secretly together, raised a vast power of Transalpinians against the Romans. In the mean time L. Lentulus the Consul, who had marched with his Army into the Ligurian Territories, obtained there a great victory. It was Some Authors report, That these Consuls were the first who led the Roman Army over the Entrepis Ligurians and Insubrian Gauls. But I rather believe, that the Po was crossed over and the Insubrians first encountered in their own Country in the next Gallick commotion. About this time Embassadors were sent to Ptolemie King of Egypt to profer him assistance in his wars against Antiochus and the Syrians; The King returned thanks, telling them withall, That he had no need of assistance inasmuch as the quarrel was compounded. After this Hiero came them to do, being a confederate Prince, having deserved much of them, and a companion of their greatest Victory. He bestowed on the people of Rome two hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat; he came to behold the sports which were prepared against next year.

For according to some Authors the secular sports were celebrated in the Consulship of P. Cornelius Fasti Capitolini 417. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus and C. Licinius P. F. P. N. The Masters of the Revells were M. Emilius M. F. & M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator. In the mean time the Boian Princes, confiding in the multitude of Auxiliaries they had from beyond the Alps, sent to the Consuls demanding, That Ariminum with its Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be returned them, otherwise a terrible and Desolative War would ensue. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gauls their demand, they answered therefore, They should send Embassadors to the Senate, to signify their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadors could go and return again. The Embassadors at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no noise, in asmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it? While the Embassadors returned, the Boians fought a set Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their maine Errand was to possess that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ater and Galatus as Traitors, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battel was fought with much slaughter, and both sides being thereby much weakened; the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being so quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a set Battel Overthrown the Enemy, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Castles, some by storme, some by composition. C. Licinius intending to saile over into Corfica, not having boats enough to transport his whole Army, sent M. Claudius Glycias before, with a Party; who, being vainly arrogant, when he saw that the Corsicans were terrified at his coming, without any respect to the Consul by whose direction he was sent, or consideration of his own office and duty, made a league with them, upon certain Conditions, in his own Name; thinking thereby to attain unto himselfe the Glory of having reduced that Island. But the Consul following with the Residue of the Army, forbore not to prosecute them with armes (notwithstanding they alledged in their own behalfe the Claudian Peace) till he brought them into subjection. The Senate to clear the Commonwealth from the Imputacion of Breach of Faith, ordered Glycias the Authour of that dishonourable peace, to be delivered up into the hands of the Corsicans; and they refusing to take him, he was put to death in the Common Gaole. This year were Consuls L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus & Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, who made no Lullation because Cerco died in his Cent-fourth. For all Claudius was delivered up to the Corsicans, and then executed as a Malefactor, yet the Barbarians could not by any means be perswaded that the Roman war afterward was juſt against them. Their minds therefore being agrieved with the memory hereof were easily tempted to break out in armes in imitation of their neighbour Island Sardinia. For the Carthaginians by secret promises had incited the Sardinians to Rebellion, who readily entertained the motion, as not too much hating their old Masters, nor loving their new ones.

This news being brought to Rome, filled the City both with fear and indignation, not that they much regarded Sardinia, but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break out again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier; (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather than a Roman war, were hereupon so terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadors in vaine, they did at length fend ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answer, till Hanno the youngest among the Embassadors, but of an undaunted mind, and a free tongue, replied, If you are preposterously determined to deny us that Peace which we have bought, not for a year or two, but for ever, at least restore us our price we gave you, Sicily and Sardinia: In private contrails 'tis no honest man's part, when the bargain is made void, to receive his Commodities back, and not return the money laid down for them. Then the Romans, being ashamed to seeme the Authors of an unjust war, diffinied the Embassadors with a better Answer. So one of this yeares Consuls C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bullus (now the second time Consul) remained in Italy, the other, T. Manlius. T. F. T. N. went according to his lot into Sardinia. He, in many places encountering the Enemy with good success, appeald the whole Island, subdued the Sardinians, and triumphed over them the sixth of the Ides of March.

These things being accomplished, and the Roman Armes laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Janus was shut; an unusual sight in Rome, and not seen after the dayes of Numa, for the space of about four hundred and forty yeares. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wife man waight war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finished, sometimes could not obtain: but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few monthes, were heard of

of, which bereaved them of the sweetnes of that Peace, which they had scarce well tasted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been subdued, shake off the yoke, and the Corsicans brake out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raised Tumults, even in Italy it selfe. Therefore L. Posthumus A. F. A. N. Albinus and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C. N. Maximus being Consuls had order to leavy new Armies, which being disposed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping one the other, L. Posthumus assailed the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corsicans, and P. Cornelius was designed for Sardinia. This Island being of a very unwholsome aire afflicted his Army with the Plague and other diseases, whereby many mortals with the Pretor also himselfe perished. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were soon quelled after the arrival of Sp. Carvilius in a great set battel; the Corsicans were likewise subdued by him. For which exploits it was decreed he should Triumph, as he did on the Calends of April. In Liguria likewise affairs succeeded well by the management of the other Consul with his Army. At Rome Tutia one of the Veltal Virgins being condemned of Incest which she had safely committed with a slave, flew her self with her own hands. After this C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bullus, A. Posthumus A. F. L. N. Albinus being Censors, made the fortieth Lullation. 'Tis probable the number of Citizens was this year lesse then heretofore (though I find not the number recorded) because the Censor, in order to the encrease of Citizens, compelled every man to swear, That he would marry for the Procreation of children. This year Cn. Nevius a Campanian who had received pay in the Carthaginian war, did first add Fables to his Scenes. In the mean time the Ligurians and Sardinians againe rebelling, were allotted Provinces to the new Consuls, Q. Fabius Q. F. Q. N. Maximus Verrucosus managed the Ligurian War, M. Pomponius C. F. M. N. Matto the Sardinian; whereas it was reported, That the Carthaginians were the cause of this commotion, by private messengers stirring up the Barbarians to Rebellion: There were Embassadors sent to Carthage with very harsh instructions, To require the tribute due, to command them to abstain from all lands under the Roman jurisdiction, adding threats of war unless they performed what was required at their hands.

The Carthaginians had now since their former calamities gathered strength and courage, chiefly by the industry of Hamilcar, who did not only reduce those who had revolted in Africa, but had further extended the Empire: They had likewise by his conduct acquired great Dominions in Spain. Wherefore they answered the Embassadors roughly enough to all particulars; but when they, according to their instructions, propounded to the Carthaginians a Spear and a Caduceus, offering them their choice of which they pleased, they answered, That they would chuse neither, but would accept of which sever the Legates should think fit to leave behind. Hereafterward a cruel hatred began to burn between these two people, but neither party being willing as yet to commence the war, they continued in a shew of friendship, rather because they did not fight, then that the peace was firm.

Both the Consuls, returning to Rome and declaring what they had done, obtained leave to Triumph. Q. Fabius had slain many Ligurians in battel, and had compelled the rest to contain themselves upon the Alps, and made the skirts of Italy secure from their plundrings. He triumphed over the Ligurians on the Calends of February. Upon the Ides of March afterward M. Pomponius Triumphed over the Sardinians, whom he had overcome. Nevertheless the Sardinians did not abstain from War, but being by their losses rather incensed then broken, they renewed the Rebellion with much greater strength. Therefore both the Consuls, M. Aemilius M. F. M. N. Lepidus and M. Pellicius L. F. L. N. Maltolus were sent into Sardinia: they gathered together great store of plunder and spoil in that Island, which when they carried over with them into Corfica they utterly lost, the Islanders there taking it from them. At home likewise there were very vehement tumults at this time, for C. Flaminius Tribune of the people proponing an Agrarian Law, That the Pient and Gallick grounds which belonged to the Seniores should be equally divided amongst the people. The Senate opposed it, and not being able to persuade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magistrates to raise an Army for defence of the Commonwealth; Flaminius could not yet be drawn from his resolution, obtinate against all force, and inexorably by intreaties. His father likewise admonished him, To submit himselfe to the will of the Senate, and not be esteemed an author of sedition. But he still persisting in his design, called an Assembly, intending to recite the Law. But then his father Flaminius in grief and anger came to the Pulpit, and taking his son by the hand pulled him away.

A wonderful Example was there shewn with what Piety and Reverence all men held esteem of the power of a Father: For he who had contemned the indignation and cruel threats of the whole Senate, now in the heat of work, in the view of all the Roman people, to whom the Constitution of Law would have been most acceptable, suffered himself by the hand of one only old man to be drawn down from the higher place. The Modesty of the Assembly in this business is not to be forgotten, who though they saw all their hopes frustrated by the Tribunes departure, did not by the least murmure signify their discontent at his fathers action. But the Law was by this means rather deferred then avoided. C. Carvilius the other Tribune assisting his Colleague, which as it caused corruption of manners among the Commons, so it gave beginning to that most grievous Gallick war which brake out the eighth year after the division of the grounds.

her vain opinion was confirmed by the actions of the Consuls, who having committed to Government of Demetrius the greater part of the Country they had taken, retired to Trachium with the Navy and Army. But when she saw that L. Posthumius stayed behind forty ships, and leaved an Army out of the Neighbour Cities to protect the Arduennes and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Tenua began utterly to despair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatsoever. At the beginning of the Spring therefore she sent Embassadors to Rome, excusing what was past as being done by the Command of Agron whose Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of admitting affairs, neither had deserved any favour at that tribute, but to Pinnus the son of Agron, on these conditions, That he should duly pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he should quit all Illyrium, some few places excepted, that he should not sail beyond Lissus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Corycia, should not fall beyond Lissus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Corycia, Pharnis, Ipsa, Dyrachium and the Asintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agron his jurisdiction being left to Pinnus. Tenua either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the name of Protector.

Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece; the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to rise up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily encrease in Spain, which could not be established without great danger to the Romans. Hadrubal the Son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar, having revenged the death of his Father-in-law, did, partly by Arms, but more frequently by his Wisdom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthaginian subjection; and built another Carriage called the Næv, in a gulf of the sea by a most commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearer concernment, hindered for the present their designs against the Carthaginians: They sent likewise Embassadors to stop the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They sent likewise Embassadors to Carthage and to Hadrubal, warning them, To contain themselves beyond the River Iberus; and permit the Saguntines to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Laws. These things happened in the year when Sp. Carvilius Sp.F. Cn.N. Calpurnius Proconsul, who Maximus Verrucosus were again Consuls. About the same time L. Posthumius Proconsul, who wintered in Illyrium, sent Embassadors from Corycia to the Ecotians and Achaïans, declaring what he had done, For what causes the war was undertaken, with what success managed, and upon what conditions finished. They were kindly entertained forasmuch as those Nations and all the other Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reason of the continual Pyracies exercised by them under Agron and Tenua.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconsul had done, and moreover decreed another Embassie in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians, declaring, The people of Rome give aid affection toward them, and their equity toward all men. Hereby the Romans purchased great good will amongst those people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, That they should be Partners in the Isthmian Games, which was one of the four greatest Solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto because the Romans had set at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, so Corycia likewise, which was a Colonie of the Corinthians; the Athenians also embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They should have the liberty of the City of Athens, and of the Eleusinian Mysteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconsul made a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians on the Calends of Quintilis, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L.F. M.N. Flaccus, and M. Atilius M.F. M.N. Regulus being Consuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might fend some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was very great Pretor of Sardinia and Corfica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for 'twas reported that the Boians and Insubrians consulted not only one with the other, but with the Transalpine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Gelatæ a people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but such as a severe judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of ones Country makes some things pardonable which in themselves are horrid. For when besides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybills books, That the Gauls and Grecians should one day possess the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Priests, they buried alive two Gauls, of each sex one, and likewise two Grecians a man and a woman, in the beef-market, that so they possessing part of the City, might seem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M.F. M.N. might seem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raised a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joyning with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Historian, who was present at the translation of these affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thousand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thousand and two hundred footmen, and six and twenty thousand and six hundred horsemen. All the other multitude were Italians. The Veneti also and Cenomanni afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incurious might compel the neighbouring Boians to tarry to the defence of their own Country, and not join themselves with the other forces of the the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Terms of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Veneti and Cenomanni being persuaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians straggled, and Boians perfilled in Hostility; nevertheless their strength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men: but being forced to leave some at home to defend their Countries, with the rest (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Atilius, Q. F. Cn. N. Papus, and C. Atilius M. F. M.N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoining Gauls for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being aggrieved at the perpetual presence of a Pretor, with his Virges and signes of Authority, did again move Tumults; but C. Atilius the Consul soon quieted them without any great difficulty. L. Atilius had more to do with the Gauls, having broken through Etruria, and marching into Rome. The Pretor of Etruria being not able to hinder their passage, overtook them at Clusium, and late in the Evening planted his Camp not farre from them. The Gauls invenomed with all their Foot to Fesula, leaving the Horse behind with instruction at break of day only should be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewise they would on the sudden charge the Romans unawares.

The Romans were hereby deceived, and pursued the horse as if they had fled, and about Fesula were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Council, as in an occurrence not foreseen by them: Their only course was either by fight to defend themselves, or to sell their bloods at a dear rate: But the Gauls exceeding in number, besides other advantages, flow of the Romans six thousand upon the place, and put the rest to flight. The Gauls endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whether the greatest part of them which fled had betaken themselves) finding their strength to faile with their last nights march, the dayes fight, retired to cure and refresh their bodies, leaving a party of horse to besiege the hillcock, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or compulsion. In this very nick of time came L. Atilius, rather to be wished for, then upon any reasonable ground expected. For upon the first newes of the Gauls setting forward, he was sent to Ariminum, to defend the Coasts upon the Adriatick shore, but hearing their intention was to march to Rome, he marched by very great journeys from Ariminum, and by good luck came to this night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was come. Sent out some understanding the state of Affairs, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day set forward with his horse to the Hillcock, giving order to the Tribunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gauls likewise were informed by the time fires, that the Romans were come, and entered into counsell concerning the present affairs. King Anacrusus advised, that they should not encounter the Enemy, now their soldiers were laden with rich spoils, but to return home, and lay aside their plunder, and then, if occasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counsell, they departed before night, taking their journey through Etruria, by the sea side. L. Atilius having taken in those who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a set battell, but resolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time should afford.

In this conjuncture of Affaires fortune once more dispensed an unexpected accident. The other Consul C. Atilius arriving at Pise from Sardinia, and there landing his Army, marched toward Rome, along the very same Etrurian shore where the Gauls were returning. Near Telamon a Port of Etruria, the Scouts of each Army first met one the other, and the Consul, by some Prisoners who were brought to him, understanding of the Gauls march, and his Colleagues following them, wondered at so unseasonable a chance, and being confident of Victory, having the Enemy cooped up between two Confular Armies, gave order to the Colonells, To array the Army as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiment in a square body, and a low Gauls must of necessity pass, set forward with a Party of horse to prepossess it. For he made believed by his Colleague, if his undertaking succeeded, to carry away the chief Glory of the Victory. The Gauls seeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, sent round about in the night time by Atilius, sent out likewise some of their own horse, with the assistance of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Consul was come, he was forced to array and marshal his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joined one to the other: For they saw C. Atilius before them, and well knew that L. Atilius followed them behind. Against L. Atilius they placed the Transalpine Mercenaries, in the front (who from their weapons are denominated Gelatæ) behind these, for a reserve, were the Insubrians. Against Atilius were opposed the Tauriscans and Boians. The Waggon and Carts were placed as a rampire about each Wing: all their plunder, with a sufficient guard, was laid aside upon a neighbouring hill.

hill. The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Attilius had possessed, whereby L. Amilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whose journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Pisa. Taking Counsel therefore on a sudden he commandeth some of his own horse to ride to the place of fight. There the horse on both sides had a very hot encounter wherein C. Attilius the Consul was slain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings: At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulsed the enemy. The Horse-fight being thus managed, the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, so for the strange ordering of the Battle; for the Gauls being included between two Roman Armies turned their faces on each side to battle; it being very doubtful whether this posture was a greater advantage to them, it that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear secure, and were of necessity compelled to stand to it having no way to flee, or that it was a greater disadvantage to be hemmed in by two Confular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who stood in the front, with stern countenances and vast bodies; partly encouraged not only with the sweetness of praise, but of plunder also, for among the former ranks of the Gauls there was not a man, but glistered with golden bracelets and arme strings.

The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great slaughter of the Enemy, especially where the Gælatæ stood, who in a barbarous ostentation had flung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the gallick shields being long and narrow not able to cover the whole body, they stood like so many marks exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to strike the enemy, nor to come to pel-mel with light armed men. Wherefore growing desperate some running rashly upon the enemy were killed with darts before they could come to handy-brooks, others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battle. The Gælatæ being thus vanquished by the light-armed men, the compleat armed did on every side charge the Boians, Infubrians, and Tauricans and slew a great number, nevertheless the enemy stood with resolute minds, being in nothing inferior but in their weapons; for neither did their shields defend their bodies, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hacke and hew they had no good points; they were likewise made crooked at the first blow, and unfit for a second, unless they be straightened againe by your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were assured of the victory by the returne of the horse, who, having put the Gallick horse to flight, riding down the hill made an impression upon the flank of the enemy, so much the more irresistible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius describeth the Battle of the Gauls in Etruria, from whence others with little reason do dissent. For who can easily beleive, that the Gauls were compelled by a tempest to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Attilius setting upon their Rear was slain? That afterward, each party for some days kept within their defences, L. Amilius fought happily with them? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battle as fought, not on the sea Coasts, but, in the Aretine Territories. There is no question made but that fourty thousand Gauls were then slain, little lesse than ten thousand taken, with Consulatus one of their Kings: the other King Anserius who then was of great reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own also. There was great plunder found, which the Consul caused to be redressed to those from whom it was at first taken, every master owning his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Attilius, through Liguria into the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his souldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and they in a few days being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwise of it fell very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, so for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all mens eyes were chiefly intended upon Britomarus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Amilius by way of scoff led girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he tooke care they should fulfill the vow they had made, Never to unloose their girdles or Belts, till they had ascended the Capitol. L. Amilius made this Triumph over the Gauls on the third of the Nones of march. This year was made the one and fortieth Lustration by the Censors, Q. Claudius Ap. F. C. N. Censor and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the desire of revenge remained, and both the next years Consuls had Gallia for their Province; the Consuls were T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus again. The people cheerfully decreed them Armies and whatsoever accommodation belongeth to the Commencing or prosecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after so great a victory, they might easily drive away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their business. The Consuls being gone with their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission; their expedition afterwards was not their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission; their expedition afterwards was not so quick by reason of the Peltence and so many thows which fell. Others affirm, That these Consuls crossed the Po, and in a set battle overcame the Infubrians that they slew three and twenty thousand and took five thousand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in these affairs.

In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindered either by action, or by showers, so that they could not return to the general Assembly: L. Cæcilius L. F. Esfi Capit. C. N. Metellus was Created for Deftatour, who conferred for Master of the Horse M. Fabius M. F. N. Buto, by the Assembly, and Flaminius C. F. N. and P. Furius Sp. F. M. N. Philus were made Consuls. These as I think were the first Romans, who making an invasion into the Infubrians Country, crossed the Po with their Army, where the River Padina falleth into the Po.

This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their paffes over the River, and while they pitched their Camps, the enemy fiercely falling in upon them slew a considerable number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily encreased by many Prodigies related, as that in the Picenean Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etruria the sky was seen to burn, that at Ariminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moons were seen at the same time; also a Vultur was said to sit many times together in the Forum at Rome. For though these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all: Concerning the other Prodiges, the Augurs being asked their advice, answered, that the Consuls were not rightly chosen, whereupon letters were sent after them to recal them back to the City. In the mean time the Consuls having made a Truce, had quitted the Infubrians Country, and afterward having raised their liaries in the Country of the Cenomanni, had again begun to infect the pouds lying under the Alps; whereupon the Infubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden enignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called immovable, because it was not lawful to stir them but in the time of Extrem Necessity; and had now met the Romans with an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battle. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flaminius either guessing at the substance of the letters, or being pre-informed by his friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open them before battle.

Being resolved to fight, they consulted about their Mercenary Gaules, lest if they were neglected, they might have cause to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of doing harm. For they feared their inconstancy, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kinmen. At last they thought fit to place them on the other side of the River, where the bridge being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to the greater praise of the Tribunes then the Consuls. For C. Flaminius had ordered the Battle had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battels, that all the Gallick Vaborne, there is no more to be feared from them; did divide the spears of the Triarii among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onset, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were presently blunted, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the spears, and while they were busie in making them straight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them the use of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, some time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the strokes, which if it is denied, they are of no use: But the Romans thrusting with the point could do their business in a moment, and so pressing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did securely thrust them into the face and breasts.

This reported that nine thousand Gauls were slain, and double the number taken. After the Victory, they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they thought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey: But C. Flaminius insisted, that this was the envy of some Senators, and not the fault of the Aspices, whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he said also, he would not return till either the War was finished, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover, that he would cause the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of Auguries, and such superstitious fears. Nevertheless P. Furius persisting in his resolution, the Army of Flaminius, did him to tarry for some few days; but he did utterly abstain from all actions, Flaminius taking in the mean time some Cattles, as also a City of no small renown among those people. The spoils he gave to his souldiers, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the custom to meet the Consuls, and not only Flaminius but for his sake Philus also was denied the honour of Triumph. At length Flaminius by the peoples favour entered the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many rich spoils were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Armes, and chains of Gold, out of which Flaminius dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitulum, inverting the Gallick Vow, who had promised out of the Romans spoils to dedicate a Caput to Mars. Afterward the other Consul triumphed over the Gauls, and the Ligurians on the fourth of the Ides of March. The Senates ill will being hereby rather intended then overcome, did not not cease till they were both forced to disdain this their second Triumph : about the same time, by the like severity, two very eminent persons were deprived of their Priesthood, M. Cornelius Cethegius, because he had not aright laid open the Entrails, and Q. Sulpicius, because in the time of sacrifice his cap fell from his head. When these Confuls time was out, the Assembly was held by an Interrex, where M. Claudius M. F. M. N. Marcellus being made Conful, passed for his Collegue C. Cornelius L. F. L. N. Scipio Calvus. These Confuls denied Affiance to the Insubrians though they petitioned for it, M. Marcellus chidingly refusing all Conditions, out of his desire to Triumph. And the Gauls themselves seemed to meditate war rather than Peace, for having a new hired thirty thousand Gesate, and overcome the Alpes, they had gathered together a far greater number of Insubrians.

The war being thus begun, the Confuls set out in the beginning of the spring, and besieged Acerra, a Town between Po and the Alpes. It seeming difficult to drive the Romans from the siege, Britomarus with ten thousand Gesate, resolved to go forth, and waste the Regions about Po, which the Confuls understanding, so divided their Forces, that Cn. Cornelius might with part of the Army prosecute the siege, while Marcellus with two thirds of the Horle, and a choice company of light armed men, went about to succour and defend their Associates. Having chosen the lightest and nimblest, not above six hundred; with these and his Horle he marched day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Clasidium, he presently encountered before he could refresh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gesate, who being superior in number, and arrogating to themselves the mastery in horsemanship, hearing the Conful had brought but few foot along with him, left off their siege of Clasidium, and forthwith spurr'd on to crush him. Marcellus, having drawn out his battell at length, that he might not be encompassed by the multitude of his Enemies, marched forward to meet them. Their bodies were now not far asunder, when the Conful intending to begin the Charge, his Horle affrighted with the clamour and shouts of the Gauls, started aside and carried him back. The Conful fearing least this accident being esteemed an ill Omen, should damp the courage of his men, as his horle wheeled about he adored the Sun, as if he had turned about his Horle for the same purpose, according to the ancient custom, men using to turn themselves about when they worshipped the Gods. 'Tis reported, that before the first onset, he vowed to Jupiter Feretrius the spoils of the Enemies Armes; And presently espousing Britomarus in the head of his Troop, his armour glittering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged that to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King also, having seen the Roman General, advanced far before his men, and by voice and gesture challenged him to Combat; M. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breast-plate, wounded him with the spear, and with the force of his horles Carreer tumbling him to the ground, reiterating his strokes he flew him in the place, whereupon leaping off his horle, and holding the armes in his hands, he lift up his eyes to heaven, saying, Jupiter Feretrius, who beholdest the deeds of Valiant Commanders in battell! Behold, I the third Roman, as thy self saist Witness, a General having slain a General of the Enemies, doe consecrate the Royal spoils unto thee: Doe thou suffer our affaires prosperously to succeed even to the issue of the wars. Marcellus taking horle again, they entered battell with all might and main, the Romans fighting most courageously; the Conful's boldness and good Fortune having filled them no less with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallick horle nor yet the Foot which came to their relief could endure the brunt; so that a few men, which is rarely seen, carried away the Victory from a numerous Army. The spoils being gathered up, the Conful returned to his Collegue, who having taken Acerra where he found great store of Corne, being now about Mediolanum, had much ado to defend himself from the Enemy, for while he was busie in the siege of their strongest and most populous City, the Metropolis of Insubria, they had as it were round besieged him with great multitudes. But Marcellus his approach quickly altered the Scene. For the Gesate being informed of their Kings death, went away, and Mediolanum being by them forsaken, was not able to defend it self. So that many of the Insubrian forces being slain, Mediolanum, and after that Comum taken, the other Cities together with the whole Nation submitted themselves to the Romans, being fined in a summe of money, and part of their grounds, having otherwise good Conditions of Peace. M. Marcellus being returned home, made a most illustrious triumph over the Insubrian Gauls, and the Germans on the Calends of March. This is the first mention of the Germans in the Roman History, who being hired, came from the Nations beyond the Rhene, under the conduct of Virdomarus their General. These and the Gallick Captives, men of vast stature of body, with other rich spoils were led before the Triumphant Chariot. The Conful followed, with the rarest spectacle, carrying the armes of the slain General to Jupiter Feretrius; after him marched his souldiers harnessed with glittering Armes, making shouts, and Military Acclamations. In this order being come to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, M. Marcellus descending from his Chariot, dedicated his Royal spoils to Jupiter, being the third after Romulus and A. Cornelius Cossus, who had done so, and after him no man ever did the like. The people of Rome beheld these Armes with the greater pleasure, in that the Enemies were said to have vowed the Roman Armes to Vulcan. So great was the Joy of this Victory, that the Romans out of the spoils, sent a Golden Cup to Apollo of Delphos, and of the Gallick Armes to their Associate Cities round about about To Hiero King of Syracuse, besides some of the spoils, they sent the price of that Corn he had accommodated them with during the Gallick War. After this a new enemy arose, the Insubrians who infested the Seas with Piracy, and had taken some of the Roman Confuls. Against these both the Confuls were sent, P. Cornelius, and M. Minucius Rufus, who brought into subjection many people either by force or composition. Nevertheless I do not find that these Confuls Triumphed; perhaps because their Victory cost too much Roman blood. This year arose a Starre in Spain destructive to many Cities and Nations; to wit, Hannibal the successor of Hadrabal, of whose beginnings and proceedings ye will shortly read more from a greater Pen.

In the mean time the new Confuls L. Veturius, and C. Lutatius marched to the Alpes with their Army, but making more use of Treaties then Armes, they joyed many of those people with their own good liking to the Roman Societie. At this time the Illyrian War was renew'd, by Demetrius Pharius his fault, against whom many complaints were made, in as much as under pretence of the Roman friendship, he had vexed and afflicted the neighbour Cities according to his will, and having the Romans invetted with power, because he had revolted from Tenta, self like a King, and grew very heavy and intolerable both to the people of the Countrey, and the people of Illyricum, the friends and associates of the Romans, and moreover contrary to the league, he sailed beyond Lissus with fifty Armed Vessel, to the Ilands Cyclades, some of them he plundered, from others he exacted money, and had now drawn into his party, as many Illyrians as since the late War bore a grudge to the Romans, and forced the Aristantes to his side. Neither did he any whit fear the Romans, who being involved in a Gallick War, and fearing a Panick one, he thought had neither strength nor Liefure enough to revenge the Injuries of their associates. And he promised himself any favour from Philip Kings of Macedon, whom he had assisted in the Clementian War, being General of the Illyrick Auxiliaries: A War was therefore decreed against him, and preparations made. In the mean time L. Aemilius and C. Flaminius being Censours made the three and fourcieth Lustration, there were numbered two hundred and seventy thousand, two hundred and thirty Citizens. A promiscuous multitude of Libertines being dispersed amongst the Tribes, had hindered the great confusion; in imitation therefore of Q. Fabius Maximus, the Censours reduced them into four Tribes, the Equiline, Pelatinæ, Suburanæ, and the Colline. C. Flaminius in the same Countourship fenced in the high way to Ariminum, and built a shew-place, both called by his name, The Flaminian shew place, and the Flaminian way. The same Centours committed Mutilis of the Dyers trade, Chicus Flamini to the judgment of the people; not thinking it to be beneath the dignity of so high a Magistracy to enquire into petit things. About the same time the Illyrian rebellion caused the Senate to give the charge of that province to M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator, and M. Aemilius M. F. Paulus the Confuls. Demetrius on the other side, was not slack in preparing himself for the War, having sent a strong Garrison to Dimalus, and providing all necessaries for the sustaining of a long siege. In some places he gave order for the slaughter of the prime men, whose fidelity he mistrusted, and committed the Government to his own creatures. Out of the whole Kingdome he gathered a choice strength of six thousand men, whom he kept with himself in Garrison at Pharus.

In the mean time L. Paulus the Conful setting forth in the beginning of the spring, sailed over into Illyricum, and understanding that the enemy put great hopes in the strength of Damalus, which they thought impregnable; he rightly judged that it would strike much terror into them, in case he should make himself Master of it: Assaulting it therefore with very much courage and cheerfulness, he took it by storm in seven dayes time. Neither was the Conful deceived in his project, for the news hereof being spread into the neighbour Regions, messengers came flocking from every City, offering up themselves, and all their goods into the hands of the Romans. The Conful having received them into protection, sailed to the Iland of Pharus, where Demetrius kept his Court. But understanding that it was well manned with a Garrison of stout Souldiers, furnished with provision of all sorts; strong, both by situation, and also with artificial works, and guarded with the presence of the Tyrant himself; the Conful unwilling to begin a tedious siege, contrived a stratagem of great use to the speedy effecting of Victory.

For sending over the greater part of his Army in the night time, with order to cover themselves in woody Tracts; Himself appears in open day with twenty ships making towards the Haven, whereby he drew out the Pharians, among whom was Demetrius himself, to hinder his landing. Upon the first engagement it hapned, as is usual, that many more by degrees running to the succour of their friends, the City was left almost naked of Souldiers. In the mean time those Romans who had landed in the night time, taking their journey through covert places, possessed an hill even in the midst between the City and the Haven, thereby rendering it impossible for those who were come out of the Town to return safe Back.

Demetrius observing what was done, took as good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be, for declining the present skirmish, and calling his souldiers together, Valiant men, saith he, it appears that our courage is formidable to the enemy, for, betaking themselves to stratagems, they declare little trust in their force of arms. They have made use of the night season to creep into this Island, of which, if I be not deceived in you, they shall possess no more, then what they can cover with their bodys having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my Country-men of Pharos, and young men of Illyricum, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and make the Romans know, 'twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Enlius or Posthumus with all their Counsel and strength, but Tenza which conquered Illyrium by her rashness and impotence of affections. And, to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been so easie, but that Tenza chose to have me rather her enemy then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your selves, and your Cite unless by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then with happy fortune charge these men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We shall do well enough with those who are landing: if we once overcome these, the others will flee to their ships in greater haste then now they leave them.

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were possessed of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the meane time had landed, coming upon his Reare utterly routed his whole body with great slaughter. Some few by flight escaped to the Town, others by blind paths slipped away. Demetrius who in certain by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures getting aboard one of them fled to Phillip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likewise was authour unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this flight Pharos was taken, and by the Consul's Command plunder'd and demolished. The Illyrian affaires being afterward settled to his own liking, the Consul now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chosen to follow Polibius, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Consuls, who having summoned Demetrius to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Island of Issa by the same arts as I have related, and then taking Pharos by Treachery expelled him out of the Dominions. Concerning whose end likewise they differ from Polibius, who lived neerer these times and these places, but those things as being after this time I shall passe by. But the Romans, for King Pinnes his sake, whose years declar'd him innocent of these designs, did spare the Illyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of some Articles. L. Aemilius made a most glorious Triumph over these people, and I find also that M. Livius Triumphed for this War, but most writers mention it not; 'tis likely, because the performances of L. Paulus, being the more eminent, did obscure the glory of his Colleague.

More notable a while after was the Judgment and condemnation of the same M. Livius. He and L. Paulus being out of Envy accused, That they had not equally distributed the spoils among the souldiers, but had converted many things to other uses, did undergoe the sentence of the people. L. Paulus hardly escaped, M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only the Mæcian. Which disgrace and indignity he took so heavily, that departing the Cite, he avoyded all meetings, till the Commonwealth's occasions recalled him to his former course of life. But these things hapened in the Consulship of P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus. But in the same year when M. Livius and Paulus were Consuls, one Archagathus the son of Lysanias came out of Peloponnesus to Rome, who professing Physick was made free of the Cite, endowed with all the privileges of a Roman, and had a shop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian street. A thing not so much worthy taking notice of, but that then first was the name of the Medicinal faculty heard of and known at Rome; they having to this time preserved their healths by temperance and remedies not bought. In the same Consul time Colonies were deduced to Placentia and Cremona in the Gallie Territories, Being none of the least causes of anger which moved the Boians and Insurbrians to incline to Hamibal, who, now assaulting Saguntum with all might, did by the rulnes thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But these and other commotions, which in great number, and with no lesse Terror and violence presently assailed the Romans, will the better be understood by relating foregoing Circumstances.
